It is important to put it on the record that of the 23 Bills that have been committed to Standing Committee this Session, 12—more than half—had no knives incorporated into their programme apart from the out date. Of the 11 Bills where the Programming Sub-Committee agreed to the incorporation of knives, four had two knives, three had three knives, two had five knives and one had seven knives. There is understandable concern, which I share, that programming should be in the interests of the whole House. The hon. Member for Macclesfield has made some practical suggestions for improving matters. We have accepted some and rejected others, for the reasons that I have given. We are not therefore considering a big Opposition-Government confrontation; we are simply assessing how best we can move forward and improve programming.

Sir Robert Smith: I want to reinforce the fact that the amendments represent an attempt to balance the programming system slightly more in favour of the whole House. The Leader of the House should reconsider his response. Earlier, he said that programme motions help outsiders to plan their travel arrangements, but he went on to say that approximately 12 Bills had no knives in them. How did people plan their travel arrangements for those Bills?

Mr. Hain: The point is that when there are knives, and the out date is determined by the programme motion, people know roughly when things will occur.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Given the adversarial nature of this place, it is understandable that the focus is on Government and Opposition parties. However, does my right hon. Friend agree that programming benefits at least Back-Bench Members of the governing party, who used to be under pressure to say nothing in Committee but are now set free to participate in debates? I believe that scrutiny is consequently of better quality.

Mr. Hain: I agree. I remember serving on Committees when I was in opposition and being told to keep quiet or to speak for a long time. Under the previous Government, Conservative Back Benchers said nothing in Committee. They simply stared in a concentrated fashion at their constituency correspondence.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have the greatest respect for my right hon. Friend, but if he believes that Back Benchers sitting supine, having been told by Whips to keep their mouths shut, is a demonstration of democracy, I hope that he will soon disabuse himself.

Mr. Hain: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend. I was saying exactly the opposite of what she suggests. I agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) that programming had encouraged Back Benchers of all parties, including the Government party, to make constructive contributions.

The second motion before us takes note of the Procedure Committee's fourth report of the previous Session on procedures for debates, private Members' Bills, the powers of the Speaker and the Government's reply. The report is wide ranging and I shall leave it to the Chairman of the Committee to describe it in detail.

The motion implements the recommendation in paragraph 13 of the report for an experiment with shorter Back-Bench speeches. It is proposed that, between certain hours—the Committee suggests an hour before the winding-up speeches, or half an hour in a half-day debate—the Speaker might call on Back Benchers to make shorter speeches, down to a minimum of three minutes depending on the number of Members who want to take part. The precise arrangements would be for the Speaker to determine. The experiment would run for the next two Sessions, and we could then consider whether it should continue.

The third motion seeks to make permanent the Sessional Order on deferred Divisions. I believe that most hon. Members find the provision for Divisions to be deferred in specific, well-defined circumstances of great convenience, and I see little point in the House revisiting what is now established practice, Session by Session.

The fourth motion would make permanent the temporary Standing Order on carry-over of Bills, which was agreed by the House for this Parliament only in October 2002. As the Procedure Committee found in its report on programming, > "carry-over increases flexibility and has the potential to lessen bottlenecks in the legislative process".

The Committee commended the gradual way in which the Government have introduced carry-over. Two Bills were carried over from the previous Session to the current Session, and three from this House and another in the House of Lords are to be carried over from the current Session to the next.

Those who believed that carry-over was an underhand method of undermining the Sessional cut-off have been proved wrong.

Sir Nicholas Winterton rose—

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hain: I shall give way shortly.

Carry-over has been a helpful but modest measure to increase flexibility in legislative planning, facilitating pre-legislative scrutiny. That is important: it is not a coincidence that all three Bills to be carried over in this House this Session have been published in draft for pre-legislative scrutiny.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for his courtesy, but he missed out a rather important sentence in our recommendation on carry-over. Although the report states that it > "increases flexibility and has the potential to lessen bottlenecks in the legislative process", paragraph 62 states that

> "however, we also believe that this should proceed with cross-party agreement."

That slightly changes the emphasis of the Leader of the House.

Mr. Forth: Shocking!

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman's contrived anger is genuinely synthetic. Carry-over normally happens by consensus. The hon. Member for Macclesfield makes a fair point.

Sir George Young: Let me press the Leader of the House a little further: will he give an assurance that, in future, the Government will carry over only with cross-party agreement?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman knows that we must get agreement in both Houses to move forward. I want to act by consensus, but I do not want to place a block on carry-over in the Standing Orders if consensus cannot be gained. It is in the Government's interests to get consensus, which a constructive Opposition provide most of the time.

We believe that it would be timely to make the Standing Order on carry-over permanent. A few amendments are proposed to make it clear that the Order would not apply to private Members' Bills or Lords Bills, and that any programming order agreed in the first Session would continue to apply in the second.

The fifth motion amends Standing Order No. 47 on short speeches. That follows representations that I have received from the Liaison Committee, the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Procedure Committee. The Committees were concerned that if the short speeches rule were applied to a debate on a Committee report on the Floor of the House, the Chairman's ability to explain the Committee's position would be restricted. That is why it is proposed to enable the Speaker to exercise discretion over the times during a debate when the short speech limit is to apply. If he thinks fit, the Speaker will be able to exempt particular Members, such as Committee Chairmen, from the limit, or modify it in appropriate circumstances.

The sixth and final motion seeks to implement the recommendation made by the Modernisation Committee in its report on connecting Parliament with the public that the term "strangers" be no longer used in referring to visitors to the House. It amends each of the Standing Orders that refer to "strangers" or "stranger", replacing that with "the public" or "member of the public" as appropriate.

Mr. Forth: Pathetic!

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman describes that as pathetic, but the "Oxford English Dictionary" defines a stranger as > "one who is not a member or an official of the House and is present at its debates only on sufferance".

I believe that our visitors, voters and citizens are entitled to view our debates, and that they should not be shunted into a pigeonhole labelled "Strangers". As the Modernisation Committee said,

> "this is the last impression we should be wanting to give to people who exercise their democratic right to visit us."

The earliest reference to a "stranger" in the Commons Journal appears to be on 13 February 1575. Let us make 26 October 2004 the last. The history of strangers is interesting. An order passed on 8 December 1711 states,

> "that no member of this House do presume to bring any stranger or strangers into this House or gallery thereof, while the House is sitting."

For a long time, members of the public were barred from scrutinising what happens in the House. Redlich's 1908 "Procedure of the House of Commons" records that during the 16th and 17th centuries, calls were repeatedly taken to ascertain whether strangers were present, primarily because of the threat of Catholic spies. Surely we can move on from those days.

Lady strangers have been subjected to particular restrictions in the past. Redlich's book states:

> "Between 1778 and 1834, ladies were expressly excluded. They might, it is true, come if they be content with a view from the roof chamber over the ceiling inserted in the old St. Stephen's chapel through the ventilator, around which seats were placed."

We are considering an ancient, mediaeval—if not earlier—practice. We should get rid of it.

Ms Coffey: Does that mean that the Strangers Gallery will now be renamed the Public Gallery?

Mr. Hain: I was going on to say that the motion does not address how we refer to parts of this House: the Strangers Gallery, the Strangers Dining Room or the Strangers Bar. Of course, those are matters for Mr. Speaker, as advised by the relevant domestic Committees, which, I understand, are aware of the recommendation by the Modernisation Committee.

These motions represent a sensible package of reforms: a consolidation of experimental reforms, which have now stood the test of time and proved their worth, and some modest innovations. I hope that the House will agree to their implementation. I commend the motions to the House.

1.50 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Some people will dismiss today's debate as marginal and insignificant and concerned only with procedural matters. They could not be more wrong. Today's debate is about accountability and about Parliament having the tools it needs to hold the Prime Minister and his Government to account. It is important that we take parliamentary procedure seriously. It is by cutting the pennies that make up the pounds that this Government have devalued the currency of Parliament.

I want to congratulate the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), under whose guidance the Committee has a produced a fine report—its fourth report of the Session—on programming. I welcome the report's recommendations, which contain much sense and good material. I am pleased that members of the Committee took notice of some points made not just by Ministers but by others, including me and my right hon. and hon. Friends, during the evidence sessions.

Programming affects the scrutiny that this House and its Committees can exert over Government proposals.

[Mr. Oliver Heald]

As the Committee noted in its introduction, programming has been

> "the most significant change made for some years in the way in which the House considers Bills".

Over recent years, there has been a lot of controversy over the extent to which Bills should be debated within a rigid timetable. Throughout the 1990s, we were prepared to try to reach agreement on such matters. From 1997 onwards, we agreed programme motions on an all-party basis, including 11 in the 1997–98 Session and four in each of the following Sessions. Some difficult Bills such as the Scotland and Government of Wales Bills were timetabled by agreement, even though that involved great technical difficulties, given that the Committee stages were on the Floor of the House, with many Members wishing to speak from different perspectives.

The failure of the consensual approach developed in that period resulted from the Government trying to pack Sessions with extra legislation, relying on our good will and allowing insufficient time for proper consideration. We lost patience with the system, agreed programming died and we ended up with routine guillotining. The Leader of the House says that programmes have been agreed in Committee and, on odd occasions, on the Floor of the House, but the fact is that on the overwhelming number of occasions when programme motions have been considered on the Floor of the House we have opposed them, not only because we do not think it right that the views of the Opposition should be completely disregarded and programmes imposed, but because the Government have routinely not allowed enough time for business.

I agree that a Government are entitled to get their legislation through without inordinate delay, but—

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): There is no sanction.

Mr. Heald: As my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) says from a sedentary position, there is no sanction on the Government, and it is not right for a Bill to reach the end of its progress through the House without all its significant aspects and issues having been examined and debated.

The Modernisation Committee, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) criticised, admits in its first report of the 2002–03 Session that > "concern about the volume of legislation which passes undebated is entirely legitimate".

At that time, of course, the Committee was chaired not by the Leader of the House but by his predecessor, but I am sure that if the current Leader of the House examined the issue he would agree that large amounts of legislation should not be passed undebated. Indeed, hon. Members on both sides of the House should agree on that point, yet that is precisely what happens persistently under the current system. We only have to look at the evidence that the Clerk to the House gave to the Procedure Committee, which appears in table A on page 5, to see the sad state into which the House has fallen. With one Bill, 36 groups of amendments were not considered in Committee, and with another 105 clauses were not debated in any way. It is just not good enough for the Leader of the House to say that those provisions would not have been considered anyway.

Ms Coffey: Does the hon. Gentleman think that it would be a good idea to make comparisons with what happened to Bills before we had programming? During the 1992–97 Parliament I sat on several Standing Committees and recall that, for several reasons, a great number of clauses were not debated. It is not correct, therefore, to say that Bills have not been debated only since programming was introduced. It would be fairer if the hon. Gentleman were to make a wider comparison.

Mr. Heald: I do not accept that the Labour Opposition were as idle or useless as has been suggested. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) will remember the Criminal Justice Bill Committee, on which we sat for 240 hours. It is true that some Labour members of the Committee—not the Prime Minister, who, although he was on the Committee, never attended anywhere other than the Corridor—made some good points, and we agreed amendments as a result.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that many clauses are now thoroughly less well debated as a consequence of the liberation of Government Back Benchers, who take up time, thereby denying it to the Opposition who would effectively make points? Opposition Members are constrained from doing so as a consequence of the operation of the timetable.

Mr. Heald: Of course, were the Government to make a pincer movement, not only by proposing a tight programme but by encouraging their Back Benchers to speak at great length, they could oppress the Opposition even more than they do at present. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) made that point in a recent Westminster Hall debate, to which I believe the Deputy Leader of the House responded.

Mr. Hain: If the structure is so tyrannical from the Opposition's point of view, why did eight of the 22 Bills that have completed their Committee stage so far this Session report early? If the Opposition were being denied the chance to scrutinise all those Bills, why did they report early? Why will the hon. Gentleman not acknowledge that the Government are well able to—and do—reconsider the out date when the need arises? We extended the out date for the Pensions Bill, for the Higher Education Bill and, more recently, for the Mental Capacity and Civil Partnership Bills, in that spirit.

Mr. Heald: If the Government want to be as constructive as the Leader of the House suggests, they could simply agree the modest amendments that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield has tabled, which move the balance slightly in favour of the proper scrutiny of legislation. It is sad that a Government with such a large majority should have got into the way of thinking, "We are in power, so we will do things our way." I am absolutely certain that were the Leader of the House standing on this side, as he may well be in six nonths' time, he would be saying what I am saying. No Opposition could tolerate the way in which this Government want to operate.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Is not one of the worst abuses of the timetabling system the Government's habit of tabling a huge number of amendments very late in the day, both in Committee and on Report? A notable example of such abuse occurred in the case of the Bill that became the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. Although there were two Standing Committees, not just one, the Government still managed to table a huge chunk of amendments on Report. Moreover, there is still no timetable motion for the Report stage of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill, which will take place tomorrow, because the Government have withdrawn some of the amendments that they tabled last week.

Mr. Heald: I was intending to make the same points. Indeed, we have made them week after week during business questions, as the Leader of the House must acknowledge. I have raised the question of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill twice, each time asking whether we have yet received all the Government amendments. Each time the Leader of the House has said that he is anxious for there not to be too many late amendments—and then another raft of them arrives a few days before the next stage. That is no way in which to conduct the business of the House. Now we hear that even the latest batch of amendments is flawed, and the Government have had to withdraw them. No doubt we shall get another lot, and there will be another recommital. It is a shambolic way of doing business.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): May I raise the wider issue of changing Standing Orders? Is my hon. Friend aware that the last Conservative Government did not change any of them without the consent of the official Opposition? The last changes were, I think, the Jopling reforms. The then Prime Minister, John Major, instructed the person in charge of the negotiations—me—that no changes should be implemented unless the then official Opposition approved each and every one. Has my hon. Friend been similarly asked by the Leader of the House whether he consents to these changes?

Mr. Heald: The process has not been similar in any way.

It is a sad thing for the House that it is not possible to stand by conventions that are seen to work over time. It is a good thing if we can find ways of moving forward on matters of procedure without the ruthless arrogance that we see nowadays. The Clerk of the House has been impartial, as ever, in his evidence, and table A is an indictment of the Government, showing that thousands of issues have been ignored and have not been debated. Interest groups come to us, as the Opposition, and say "We would like this point to be aired in Committee, because we do not think the Bill will work properly unless it is considered." How must they feel when for want of time, with the fall of the knife, a matter of real concern to them falls as well?

It is worth noting that the Finance Bill, which involves large amounts of money, is not dealt with in that way. It is the one exception. The Government do not guillotine it because they know that those in the City of London, the real power brokers, would not accept that for a minute.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman is falling into a familiar Conservative trap. Basically, he is saying that doing nothing is not political. Doing nothing is just as political as changing. Doing nothing is what the Conservatives are excellent at. That is why they are Conservatives; that is why they love the status quo—

Mr. Kidney: And that is why they are in opposition.

Mr. Foulkes: Absolutely. But things have to change, things have to modernise, and the Conservative party will have to accept that. We are presenting our proposals in a reasonable, sensible way, and it is about time the Opposition looked at them in a reasonable, sensible way.

Mr. Heald: The right hon. Gentleman may have arrived too late to hear the considered remarks made earlier.

The Opposition are not standing in the way of progress. We are saying that an all-party Committee, one of the most senior in the House, dominated—like all Committees—by Labour Members, has examined the issues and taken evidence from all parts of the House and from the Clerk. A memorandum of yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is being considered. After all that consideration, the Committee came up with a number of modest proposals to improve programming, make it more consensual, and ensure that these matters are dealt with more sensibly. What is the Government's answer? It is no—unless it just happens to suit the Minister. Those are the only amendments that have been accepted.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend see any significance in the fact that the Procedure Committee is chaired by a very senior, very experienced Member who is dedicated to the welfare of the House, whereas the so-called Modernisation Committee is chaired by a Cabinet Minister?

Mr. Heald: There may well be an imbalance between those two individuals when it comes to experience, knowledge and understanding of this place, but I do not want to discuss personalities—at least, not for a moment.

The idea that we should programme Bills 48 hours after Second Reading has one benefit. By that time, the parameters and ambit of debate are known, which is why the Committee suggested that modest change. We support it; the Government do not.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: It is important for the House to realise that we are not suggesting that there should be a debate on this. We are saying that the programme motion should be put to the House without debate 48 hours after Second Reading. Genuine discussion could take place between the Whips of all the major parties, and the House and Government would be aware of the principal concerns about a Bill.

Mr. Heald: Experience shows that that would be useful. In one of the worst examples of programming, which resulted in the sit-in involving my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), things went wrong because the Government did not programme after Second Reading. It became obvious during Second Reading that extra amendments were needed to deal with the Huntingdon Life Sciences issue. Rather than sticking to the number of sittings that they agreed on Second Reading, the Government cut the number. It was a case of more amendments, less time.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman presents the motion as a gigantic attempt by the Government to smash all dissent from the Opposition. In fact, programme motions are tabled after discussion with the usual channels. As the statistics I have given demonstrate, the Programming Sub-Committee can modify the subsequent changes that are often made, sometimes at the suggestion—made informally—of the Chairman of the relevant Standing Committee. It has consistently done so, and as a result some out dates have been lengthened and some Bills have completed their progress early.

I understand and respect differences of opinion, but the idea that this is an oppressive Government ramming through their views is simply not correct.

Mr. Heald: What the Leader of the House forgets is that under the old arrangements, genuine discussion and negotiation took place on the amount of time that was available and necessary. Under the current arrangements, it is a case of "Take what we are offering, or we will impose it on you". The Opposition should not have to be a supplicant, begging the Government for time to do the job that our electors sent us here to do.

Mr. Swayne: I have been on Standing Committees that, although their sittings finished early, ran out of time. That is entirely possible as a consequence of the way in which knives fall. When highly contentious clauses are involved the Committee runs out of time, and then ends up with hours and hours, if not sittings and sittings, in which to discuss wholly uncontentious material.

Mr. Heald: That is an excellent point. The problem does arise.

Sir Patrick Cormack: That was a constructive observation, and my hon. Friend is making an excellent speech. Will he give us an undertaking that whatever happens today, if there were a change of Government at the next election—as we are all confident there will be—a Conservative Administration would implement the Procedure Committee's report without any amendment?

Mr. Heald: I certainly hope that it will be possible for the Opposition to include proposals in their manifesto that meet the spirit of what my hon. Friend wants.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I apologise for not having heard all the Leader of the House's speech. May I return the hon. Gentleman to his scurrilous attack on Government Back Benchers in Standing Committees? Does he not accept that even the most loyal Back Benchers can take their role in a Standing Committee extremely seriously, and may wish to improve legislation? Indeed, some of the most effective probing of Government comes from Government Back Benchers rather than the Opposition, who are generally more interested in filibustering than in improving legislation.

Mr. Heald: That can happen.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): I have much sympathy with the shadow Leader's argument, particularly about the programming of Bills. However, when specifically asked whether the Opposition would, if elected, accept the amendments, he said something about the spirit of the amendments, rather than about the amendments. Is that not the problem? In opposition, hon. Members say one thing, but when they get on the Government Benches they do something different.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I will make sure they do.

Mr. Heald: I am being urged on by the Chairman of the Procedure Committee. It is possible that one might want to go even further than the Procedure Committee.

We welcome the proposal that programme motions should be decided without debate only where there is cross-party support. We believe that the Government should have to justify their programmes. I also welcome the idea to give Standing Committee Chairmen discretion to allow 15 minutes overtime for completion of debate, or to make up for time lost in a Division.

The Select Committee tried to build consensus to allow programming to continue from Parliament to Parliament. The Government should be ashamed that they turned down those modest but worthwhile ideas. They accept proposals that help them, but turn down those that help scrutiny. That is cherry-picking of the worst sort—another slap in the face for the Select Committee. Even at this late stage, will the Leader of the House not think of the interests of the House and accept the amendments?

Right hon. and hon. Members will be familiar with the experiment that has been conducted with deferred Divisions. As the House will be aware, the great objection to deferred Divisions is the dislocation that they create between the debate and the decision. They have removed the connection between decision and debate, unpicking one of the key links in parliamentary scrutiny. It makes life easier for the Government, their business managers and Back Benchers—

Mr. Forth: And the Prime Minister.

Mr. Heald: It makes life easier for the Prime Minister because he needs to come here only on Wednesdays, but overall it is not in the interests of the House to have fractured debate, with the decision being made much later. One of the arguments that was always advanced for deferred Divisions was the sitting hours. People said, "It is often difficult late at night for everyone to stay and perhaps we should have the Divisions when they can be present." As we have changed the sitting hours, that argument falls by the wayside. Therefore, I ask the Leader of the House to withdraw motion 4 and to think again.

I have mixed feelings about carrying legislation over from one parliamentary Session to the next if it runs out of legislative time. It seems sensible to have the definite benefits of increased flexibility that that facility can offer to the legislative process. It can be a waste of time if Bills fall at the end of a Session and have to be reintroduced in the same form in the next. I think that there is agreement on both sides of the House that such a situation can be undesirable. However, I have reservations about a mechanism being built into the procedure whereby the discipline of an annual cut-off point is removed from Government business managers. There is a great danger that the lack of pressure could encourage even more sloppiness in the drafting, programming and timetabling of legislation. That is clearly not desirable. On balance, the House should give the benefit of the doubt to carry-over, but it should be done only with the consent of the Opposition, not imposed by the Government. That is why I will oppose motion 5 tonight.

Mr. Greg Knight: On that point, if my understanding and memory are correct, the original Standing Order provides for carry-over with the Opposition's consent. Is that not the case? Therefore, there is no need to make a change, if one accepts my hon. Friend's argument. Is he aware that in the 1997–2001 Parliament, the Opposition Chief Whip was never asked for his consent to a carry-over? Therefore, there can be no accusation that the Opposition blocked the use of the original Standing Order.

Mr. Heald: My right hon. Friend is correct to say that the understanding is that it would be possible to carry-over Bills only with the consent of the Opposition but, from my understanding and reading of the Standing Order, it does not say so. I oppose the order becoming a Standing Order under motion 5, with all the force that that implies. We may ossify the wording or entrench it, but without the commitment, which underpins it, being on the record. If the Leader of the House or deputy Leader of the House can give me assurances about that, or if I am wrong, I will be happy to think again.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Should not the hon. Gentleman be saying that, while the motion may go through today, the Modernisation Committee should look further at it? I have always argued that we elect a five-year Parliament. I accept that there should be some restriction on the period that Bills are before us, but they should not fall at the end of a Session. We should have a logical programme of Bills being introduced steadily over the five years and going into Committee at different times, instead of having silly logjams in this House and then in the other House. We should have a more sensible phased Parliament. Surely in 2004 that is the way to be moving.

Mr. Heald: I support more flexibility but I do not agree that we should move to a five-year plan. The problem with the five-year plan is that it would encourage a sloppy approach. As the hon. Gentleman should know, we have enough trouble getting a list of the Bills and draft Bills for the Session at the time of the Queen's Speech. The Leader of the House, to give him full credit, has now agreed that we will have that this year, but it will be the first time that we have a full list of the Bills. Therefore, the difficulties of moving to a five-year plan would be severe.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give the House an assurance that, if the Government accept his proposition on carry-over, which I think has a lot of sense, if legislation were proposed for carry-over that Conservatives could live with, that some Government Front Benchers liked and were proposing but that did not the meet the wishes of many Labour Back Benchers, he would speak for those Labour Back Benchers and ensure that debate was not curtailed?

Mr. Heald: I do not believe in curtailing debate. I am not sure that I entirely got the full force of my right hon. Friend's remarks but I do not believe in guillotining. I do not want anything that unreasonably curtails debate.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware of the difference between the procedure in carry-over and the procedure in dissolution? The procedure in dissolution is that the Opposition are consulted as to which Bills are to be allowed to go through and which are not, whereas on carry-over that discipline is lost. Therefore, the Government should reconsider the matter. There is no discipline throughout the parliamentary year to ensure that Bills are put through both Houses on time, in time for the Queen's Speech, as they used to be in the old days.

Mr. Heald: I agree with my hon. Friend. The other point is that the Leader of the House is a great one for saying that we should have at least as good procedures and rights as the other place. The other place is consulted and consent is required for carry-over. At this end, I believe that that is not the case. The Leader of the House can intervene on me if he wishes. The elected representatives in the House of Commons should have at least as good a system for scrutiny as the Lords.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heald: I will not as I want to move on to speeches; I have been reasonably generous in giving way.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Heald: It is appropriate that I have just one short point to make on the subject of short time limits on speeches. This experiment, which is to be welcomed, should allow for more Members to get into a debate.

[Mr. Heald]

Moreover, Select Committee Chairmen should not be subjected to strict time limits if the debate in question concerns a Committee report. Chairmen such as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield make extremely valuable contributions to the House's examination of such reports, and they should be allowed to express their views as they see fit and with a reasonable amount of time being allowed. This sensible, light-touch approach would raise the quality of debate.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on the subject of short speeches?

Mr. Heald: All right.

Mr. Foulkes: I am most grateful. I could tell that the hon. Gentleman was on dodgy ground when discussing the previous subject, given that a fellow member of the shadow Cabinet interrupted him; there's a novelty for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does the hon. Gentleman think that those of us who regularly make short speeches should be given credit for doing so, and that if the speech in question is very short, it should not be counted against us by Mr. Speaker in deciding whether to call us again?

Mr. Heald: I would not dream of telling Mr. Speaker how to work out such matters, but I am sure that it is true that a short contribution does not debar one to quite the same extent as a very long one.

I turn finally to strangers. The question of whether to delete references to "strangers" from Standing Orders is not the most significant one, but for my part I think it a pity to lose the ceremonial aspect of this ancient tradition. This proposal is one of many in the Modernisation Committee's report on connecting Parliament with the public, and it is strange that it should be one of the first to receive the House's full attention. The suggestion that not calling members of the public strangers will improve Parliament's accessibility is surely misguided. I agree that we must not be seen to be letting the public view us at work on sufferance only, but stripping away the charm and magic of this place is entirely the wrong way to approach the problem. The last thing that we want is for Parliament's historical legacy to be gradually eroded, until it becomes just another nasty new Labour-style institution.

Although I agree with motions 3 and 6 and support the Select Committee's excellent work, I think it wrong that the Leader of the House cannot go further.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): In democratic societies, Parliaments exist in order that differing views can be taken into an arena in which they can be debated and considered properly. How those arenas—be they Parliaments or local councils—arrange their affairs is much more important than simply producing a book of rules; it is a question of fairness, of order and of making it possible for everybody to take part in a proper debate. Such arrangements affect the conscious and deliberate end of particular debates.

This Parliament has, over many hundreds of years, evolved its rules because it has found that if it is manifestly unfair to any of its Members—who are then unable to express the views that they want to represent—the whole principle of government can be undermined. It is a question not just of the maintenance of order in a Parliament, but of something much more dangerous and fundamental. Elected Members who feel unable seriously to explore the real political problems of the day are not only damaged in themselves; the constituencies that they represent here are also damaged.

When we talk about the rules of order, it should not be—nor is it—a simple case of one party saying, "It is to our advantage to take these decisions", and of another party opposing for the sake of opposing, knowing full well that should the position be reversed, it would behave in the same way. I hope that today, there will be Labour Members—perhaps those who heard the Leader of the House's introductory speech—who will seriously examine the content that we are debating.

When a very large majority controls a Parliament, it is particularly important that the interests of minorities—whoever they are, and however irritating and ill informed—are not overridden, either genuinely or apparently. During 18 years of Conservative Government, we witnessed how a Government who ignore the interests of some parts of the United Kingdom—I am thinking of the specific political differences between England and Scotland—can produce such revulsion that there is an immediate need, upon a change of government, to bring in totally different laws and, indeed, a degree of devolution. Such a need was dictated largely by the political pressures that were allowed to build up because debates in the House of Commons did not reflect constituents' views sufficiently widely.

Mr. Foulkes: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am delighted to see that my right hon. Friend has at last joined us, and he is very welcome.

Mr. Foulkes: I have listened to every word that my hon. Friend has said and I have great respect for her experience. Does she agree that it would also be wrong if the irritating and ill-informed minority to whom she refers frustrated the will of the majority?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I doubt whether there is any danger of that under a system of government that relies on the current first-past-the-post principle, of which I thoroughly approve. If my right hon. Friend—who was not here at the beginning of the debate—will forgive me for saying so, that argument is total nonsense.

In talking about these matters, it is important first to look carefully at what went before and then to examine what it is we are debating today. One suggestion is that this is simply a matter of tidying up the rules, and that there is no real political effect; that we need simply to agree to certain small changes that are in the interests of all Members, and all will be well in future. That is total, dangerous nonsense. These rules will affect the role of every Back Bencher. It is also true that a Cabinet Minister chaired the Modernisation Committee that initiated and took these decisions.

I have been here long enough to know that it does not really matter what the colour of the Government is; there may not be an automatic connection between the rights of Back Benchers and the Government. Indeed, it has been known for Governments of all colours to get together with Opposition Front Benchers and to agree to measures that actually remove Back Benchers' rights because they are quite happy to have order of a kind that reflects their particular narrow interests. That is the effect of programming.

Of course, we are told that we need not worry, and that we should not look back to a golden era in which everything worked perfectly. Of course there was never a golden era. No Parliament consisting of human beings will ever be perfect; if it were, something would have gone disastrously wrong. But certain methods were open to Back Benchers to delay legislation, to inspect its true content or to negotiate with the Government of the day to secure changes that were tremendously important. Whichever way one looks at it, programming does away with that.

That in itself would not be reason enough to oppose programming if it led to close examination of every part of legislation. It would be all right if one could say that every part of every Bill that has been programmed since 1997 has been considered word by word and line by line, and in such a way that our constituents had the chance to comment on it. It would not be so bad if every piece of legislation had emerged far better at the end of the process, or if the Government were so pleased that they did not need to amend their Bills. If so, I would be here today saying that programming had something to offer and that we should support it.

The reality is that it does not work like that; automatic programming has produced a lot of legislation that has not been considered in any detail and has consistently required amendment by the Government on Third Reading or in the House of Lords. When I say that Bills have been amended, I do not mean only once or twice. In some instances, Government Bills have required 400 new amendments, showing the extent of the problem that we have to deal with.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mrs. Dunwoody: No. I do not want to take too long and I want to make some serious points.

We should make it absolutely clear that if we allow these measures to go permanently into our Standing Orders, we will be giving away the right not only to debate legislation properly, but to alter the way in which the House of Commons organises its business in future.

The Leader of the House told us that we did not need to worry too much about the breakdown of consensus because the Programming Committees seldom debate or argue. It does not surprise me if Whips Office managers come to an agreement. In many instances, Whips on both sides of the House will have much more common cause with each other than with Back Benchers and Front Benchers. That has not changed in all my time in Parliament. It is also important to understand that if we are to have this sort of arrangement, the Government must be far more flexible and far more serious about the way in which they debate these matters with Back Benchers.

The Leader of the House mentioned the Traffic Management Bill, which was a classic. We were told that, under the new arrangements, everyone would have time to get here and "programme their travel". Well, I do not know how anyone who wanted to talk about the Traffic Management Bill could have programmed their travel. It was printed on 11 December and had its Second Reading on the first day we got back, so there was absolutely no opportunity for anyone to debate it either with Back Benchers or others. That was truly extraordinary; clearly, the Government's real attitude is that much legislation should go through at a certain pace, irrespective of its faults or difficulties.

We should also understand that deferred divisions, for example, enshrine a principle that says, "You may be a debating Chamber, but we do not want you debate things that you will have to vote on at the end of the day. That might be embarrassing because you might listen to the arguments or even change the way you decided to vote!" The Government want to divide people from the proper ordering of how they cast their votes in the hope that no one will notice what is going on.

Mr. Shepherd: On deferred Divisions, the hon. Lady makes an excellent point. The worst possible feature is the fact that those who did not participate in the debate can vote on the Wednesday while those who did participate may be unavoidably unable to vote on Wednesday. It is a ridiculous system.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The trouble is that that shows that some Members of Parliament—I am not making allegations about one party or the other; it is the view of many who have recently entered the House—believe that being the Government is simply a matter of announcing what they want, pushing it through Committee and moving it on to the House of Lords, where any debate is seen as inconvenient and unhelpful. The idea is that the Government should get what they want through at a particular time. It is not a new attitude. It has been the attitude of Governments ever since I became a Member. Sadly, we seem prepared to enshrine it in the Standing Orders in a way that will prove very difficult to amend.

That goes for many of the other points about the carry-over of Bills. I sat and listened to the debates and explanations. Apparently, there will be no carry-over of legislation unless it is a very important Bill or specifically needed. The Government will not routinely carry over Bills, we are told, but will do so only where special circumstances apply. The reality is that what the Government are seeking to enshrine in the Standing Orders will make that an almost routine procedure.

If the Minister believes that not operating with a cut-off point is a good idea, I recommend that he spend some time in the European Parliament. He should examine what happens when the procedures to bring unsatisfactory legislation to an end at a reasonable time do not exist. If we ever reach the state of the European Parliament in my day there, we will have legislation that has hung around for 16 years because nobody wants it and nobody can think of a way of getting rid of it, and there is no procedural method of making it clear that such legislation will go no further. If we ever get to that position, the Minister will rue the day that he seriously made his suggestions about the carry-over of Bills.

Mr. Francois: I do not want to miss the hon. Lady's point about the European Parliament, which affects the proposals on short speeches. I accept that there may be some merit in trying to squeeze in a few extra speakers at the end of a debate if they have sat through the whole procedure and are bursting to make a point. However, does she agree that we should put down a marker, but that we should not allow it to become a slippery slope? If the proposals are extended as she suggested earlier and the Government tried to make short speeches the norm, Back Benchers could end up with only three minutes, or even two, to speak, as is the farcical situation in the European Parliament?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Other organisations have an even better idea. I was once offered one minute and 30 seconds for my contribution to a debate. Luckily, the Conservative sitting beside me—this was in an international Parliament—was offered the same, so we decided that we would get up, announce our names and our country and sit down. I am sure that that would never happen in the House of Commons—[Interruption]—but it is something that we should be aware of.

If these matters had been considered properly, I would have expected the Leader of the House to demonstrate clearly to us today which of the particular measures has worked and improved the way in which we do our business. For example, I would have expected to be told how many Bills had been amended massively on Third Reading or how many clauses of Bills had been affected.

I sought to acquire that sort of information and found that, in 1996–97, there were 896 clauses and schedules on the introduction of legislation. There were 1,044 pages, which had become 1,143 on Royal Assent. In 1999–2000, there were 2,637 clauses and schedules; 2,796 pages, which had become 3,600 on Royal Assent. There may be a dozen [redacted] suggesting that it was the result only of programming, but it would have been helpful had we heard a reasoned argument this afternoon. It is not good enough to hear, "We tried this and it is very good, so we must keep it and make it permanent". I want a proper debate of the House's privileges, interests and commitments before I agree to permanent changes to our Standing Orders.

Finally, some of us are regarded as beyond the pale because we dare to think that some things that happened in the House before 1997 were not wholly reprehensible. Some of us value some of the changes that took place. The Leader of the House mentioned my friend, John Golding. He is an interesting example because of the length of time he once spoke to a Bill. He had been a telecoms engineer, understood the Bill perfectly—it changed that industry for ever—and spoke for about 14 hours without repeating himself. I can assure the House that, had he done so, the Chairman of the Committee would have had him thrown out. In other words, he did not break the rules of order; nor did he seek to distort the debate. He used genuine and acceptable methods to ensure that the legislation did not pass in a wholly unamended form. MPs should strongly defend that right.

I do not necessarily want to go back to filibustering or to abandon programming, but I want something much more important. I want the Government to understand that we are not elected to the House simply to agree every bit of legislation that is put forward. Proposals are often unfinished, inadequate and insufficiently debated. I want the Government to agree that I came here to help produce good laws, not bad ones. The Procedure Committee has made some very mild suggestions; if the Government persist in not accepting them, I shall begin to have very grave doubts.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who speaks with great commitment, conviction and experience. I want to pick up on her final point. She will have noticed that, in business questions last week, the Leader of the House answered my question by making it absolutely clear that this is a free vote. I hope that all Labour Members recall that. These are not Government recommendations, and there will be no interference or influence from the Whips. I shall be interested to see whether the hon. Lady and other colleagues are able to take advantage of this unusual opportunity.

The whole House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), and to all his colleagues on the Procedure Committee. The Committee reached a unanimous decision and it would be invidious to pick out too many names, but the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Rosemary McKenna) is worthy of particular note. She is no patsy, but she was persuaded by the evidence that these proposals are the right way to go.

I also endorse what the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said about this set of proposals being carefully constructed, and based on evidence. The recommendations have not been grabbed out of the air, but have been considered very thoughtfully. It is worth noting, too, that the Leader of the House and others gave evidence to the Committee.

When the Deputy Leader of the House responds to the debate, I hope that he will be able to address the Committee's recommendations. We are talking about a Select Committee of this House giving advice about House matters, and the evidence that it has taken is very comprehensive.

I do not want to make you blush, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I want to draw particular attention to the excellent memorandum that you put to the Committee. I think that it shows the base of experience shared by all those who chair our Committees—and you, sir, also have that responsibility—and the memorandum contains a number of very practical suggestions that the Committee clearly took very seriously.

I hope that all hon. Members taking part in this debate have read pages 19, 20 and 21 in the evidence section of the report, which are of critical importance because that evidence is based on real experience. The Leader of the House has come to these matters comparatively recently, but experienced people from all parts of the House have decided that something must be done along the lines recommended by the Procedure Committee.

I have the advantage—I suppose that it is an advantage—of having been in on the act when we were first considering how to improve procedures. Unlike the Leader of the House and the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), I was involved in the discussions from 1997 onwards in the Modernisation Committee and through the usual channels. There was general recognition that the blunt instrument of the guillotine—I suppose that, in this context one can call a guillotine a blunt instrument—was no longer appropriate for our business. All too often, it was being misused by hon. Members on both sides of the House to prevent good discussion and examination. As a result, we were not doing our duty in terms of effective scrutiny.

The amendments tabled by the Procedure Committee take account of the experience since 1997. As has been recognised already, they also make it clear that no golden age preceded that date. Successive Governments used the guillotine procedure in a way that did not help good scrutiny, and which certainly did not give opportunities to the Opposition parties to do their job.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman will concede that, back in the 1980s and early 1990s, each Standing Committee began its consideration of legislation without a timetable. Essentially, Opposition Members were in charge of timing and could dictate the pace of proceedings. The crucial difference now is that the Government dictate and control the shape, size, timing and end date of Committees. In parliamentary terms, the balance has been altered. Formerly, the Government had the majority and the Opposition controlled the time. That has changed radically. Now, the Government have the majority and also control the time. Surely the hon. Gentleman can see the dangers in that.

Mr. Tyler: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my theme, but I accept that there is validity in what he has said. However, I was a Member of this House for a very brief time in the 1970s, and I recall that I had the crucial, swing vote in the Committees on which I served because the Government of the day had no overall majority. The situation was very curious: I could determine the timetable for consideration of certain Bills in certain Committees. I do not think that that is a very clever idea either—although I was, of course, a very wise young man.

I am in favour, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of precisely what you identify in your memorandum. Good will is needed on both sides to make these proposals work, so that we can fulfil a tripartite purpose. The report states the original purpose, says what members of the Modernisation Committee looked at, and makes some recommendations. I think that it responds to the point just made by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

First, there is no doubt that a Government should have reasonable opportunity and power to secure their business within a reasonable period. Effectively, it is not unreasonable for a Government to determine when legislative proposals leave Standing Committee, and to try and get through the House the business that they promised to the electorate in their election manifesto.

However, my point is that that depends on the Government taking a reasonable attitude to timing. When a Government introduce strings of amendments, new clauses and new schedules, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich described, they cannot expect that those debates can be compressed into the time scale originally set out.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: I want to develop three points, and then there may be a chance for the right hon. Gentleman to contribute.

Secondly, Opposition Members and Government Back Benchers have a responsibility to prioritise the parts of particular legislation that they consider most need scrutiny. On this point, I am very much in tune with what the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said. It is important that that prioritisation should be a matter of discussion and that members of the Opposition parties and Government Back Benchers should have a role in that decision. In a moment, I shall describe how I think that that should be done.

Thirdly, the goal must be that we end up with a better product. That is surely what we should all be trying to obtain.

Mr. Foulkes: On that specific point, ending up with a better product involves proper scrutiny. I accept that, but none of the critics—not my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), nor the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), who spoke for the Opposition—has mentioned a major change that has taken place. I am talking about pre-legislative scrutiny. I have just taken part in a Joint Committee—comprised of Members of the Houses of Lords and of Commons—on the draft Charities Bill. We went through it paragraph by paragraph, and we have made recommendations to the Government before publication of the final Bill. Why does the hon. Gentleman not take account of that major change?

Mr. Tyler: Observers might think that that was a planted question. I am very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising a point that I was about to come to. We in this House are developing methods that allow Bills to be scrutinised carefully before they reach the Floor of the House. That is very valuable, but it should inform the discussion about prioritisation. It should not simply offer a carte blanche—a blank cheque—to the Government to decide how everything should be handled.

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No, as I want to develop my argument.

It is critical that the House consider very carefully the amendments tabled by the Procedure Committee. It is an all-party Committee with a Government majority, and its recommendations would fulfil all our objectives.

[Mr. Tyler]

I shall illustrate how the proposals can be developed. It is critical that those who are going to do the hard work of scrutiny in Standing Committee or on Report on the Floor of the House should have the opportunity to make decisions about priority. That should involve more than just a general discussion behind the Speaker's Chair between Whips. The people who are going to do the work of scrutiny should have the responsibility—not just the opportunity—to make that decision.

I shall give an example of that. Amendment (a) is very interesting and deals with what happens when a Bill comes back to the House on Report. This is a classic case, as no report is produced for Report stage. That is another of the misnomers that we encounter in this place. No report is produced for the House about how a Bill has been debated, handled and considered, or about what has been left out and what late amendments submitted.

I recall the Report stage of the Bill that became the Transport Act 2000, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich will recall it too, as she was a key participant in the discussions at that time. I do not want to reveal any terrible secrets, but I remember that a number of Government Back-Bench Members wanted to ensure that issues of concern to them were subject to proper discussion on Report on the Floor of the House. I, as my party's Chief Whip, went to the then Chief Whip for the Government, the right hon. Member for Dewsbury (Ann Taylor), who sensibly thought that it was important to timetable the discussion on the Floor of the House to enable Members on both sides, including Labour Back Benchers, to debate issues that were divisive and controversial and to have a Division on them. That is a classic, sensible way to use programming. We agreed a programme across all the parties—I do not recall whether the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) or a colleague was involved—so that the issues that hon. Members wanted to debate could be prioritised. That is the sort of programming that I favour, because it does credit to the House and, most importantly, it produces better legislation.

On amendment (b), the Procedure Committee has produced a sensible suggestion that incorporates what we discussed all those years ago. It makes a clear distinction between those who discuss these matters in Committee and the general run of Members, because the delay is not just for fun. It is to ensure that the members of the Committee know that they are indeed to serve on it. The programme motion would incorporate the views of those Members who would do the job, and not just those of the Whips. The delay has a specific function and I congratulate the Committee on introducing that suggestion.

Amendment (c) is also very sensible, but amendment (d) is critical. It is self-determination within the Committee that is critical to effective decision making. The Programming Sub-Committee should not just take the form of a quiet discussion between the Whips. It should offer an opportunity for anyone on the Standing Committee involved to put their view about the way in which the Bill is being handled, its sticking points and controversial issues. I know from experience and from talking to several Chairs—

Sir Patrick Cormack: How can the hon. Gentleman talk to a chair?

Mr. Tyler: I have talked to several Chairs, in the sense of those persons of both genders who chair Committees.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Chairmen.

Mr. Tyler: I cannot take this old-fashioned nonsense. Everybody else refers to Chairs in a non-gender specific way.

Mr. Forth: No, they do not.

Mr. Tyler: Well, I have talked to the Chairwomen and Chairmen of the Committees on this issue. The role of those people could be very important, because they could facilitate an effective discussion outwith the formality of the Committee sitting to ensure that proper priority is given to the decisions.

I have outlined the core principles. The Programming Sub-Committee should take full responsibility for the way in which Bills are considered in Committee. When Committee stage takes place on the Floor of the House, a fuller discussion is required. Back Benchers should have access to those discussions and they should not be a matter only for the three major parties. On Report, that is even more the case, because that is the moment at which the House is entitled to a report on the Bill by the independent Chair of the Committee. In that way, the whole House could be advised by the Standing Committee, which had full knowledge of the issues involved.

I am strongly in favour of the recommendations of the Procedure Committee—and the way in which it has incorporated them into practical amendments to the motions. Although it will be a free vote, I hope that my colleagues will support me.

Motion No. 3 contains some sensible suggestions. We have now had time to recognise that sometimes there is great pressure from Members wishing to speak in a debate. I wish occasionally that we were allowed two days for a Second Reading, but the sheer weight of legislation makes that more difficult. However, the quid pro quo for agreeing to give the Chair more discretion on the timing of speeches should be the Government agreeing to be more flexible when allocating time for Second Readings. The Government should also take more note of what a Committee Chair, and his or her Committee, has to say about the extent to which a Bill has been considered. However, I accept that in all circumstances there will be occasions when the number of Members wishing to speak should mean that the Speaker, or his representatives in the Chair, has the option to limit speeches.

The argument about deferred Divisions is curious. In a sense, we will have a deferred Division at 6 pm. I have not counted how many hon. Members are in their places, but it is nonsense to suggest—as the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said a few moments ago—that we all arrive to vote having fully discussed and listened to all the arguments. On occasion, most of us—although I hope not all of us all the time—come to a Division without having heard all the arguments or speeches. It is now 3 pm and there are three hours to go before we have a Division, but that does not mean that it will be disconnected from the debate. Precedents exist: on occasion we had deferred votes on matters that came before the House when it sat in Committee or on Report, even before deferred Divisions were introduced. Indeed, we have had remarkably few deferred Divisions recently, which shows that it has been a useful discipline on the Government. I hope that that will continue. Deferred Divisions should be the exception, rather than the rule, as seems to be the pattern at the moment.

On motion No. 5, the hon. Member for Macclesfield places great emphasis on the issue of cross-party agreement. Not only is that obligatory in the other place, but there it is—to some extent—linked to the issue of pre-legislative scrutiny. That is a valid argument and an effective way to ensure that the end product is not damaged by the guillotine at the end of the Session—which has always seemed a curious way to do business. We all know—it is a fact of life—that as the end of a Session approaches, interesting discussions take place through the usual channels at both ends of the building. If the Government are not required to secure cross-party agreement, it reduces the Opposition's ability to do their job.

In your memorandum, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you placed great emphasis on the need for some mechanism to discuss such issues. At the moment, all such discussions are very informal. I would like the Deputy Leader of the House to look again at the recommendations from the Modernisation Committee, and accepted by the House, that immediately after the Queen's Speech we should have cross-party discussions on the format of the legislative programme. The Opposition parties would have the opportunity to say which Bills might be candidates for carry-over, which required pre-legislative scrutiny, and so on. That would avoid the current ridiculous situation in December and January—the London bus syndrome—when five Bills tear through the House at top speed and then none follow for months. The same thing happens in the other place. We need to pace the legislative programme better. Carry-over of Bills should be allowed, but it should be a matter for discussion between the parties.

In your very interesting memorandum, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you suggested that we might look again at the proposal for some form of business Committee, however informal, as the Scottish Parliament has. I hope that the Government will consider that issue again. It is true that after that recommendation was accepted by the House, we had such a discussion. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and I met the Leader of the House and we had a desultory conversation—because the outcome looked like a fait accompli—and we asked that the debate should continue. It never did. Indeed, the Leader of the House resigned before we had an opportunity to make such a Committee a permanent feature of our parliamentary year. I suspect the sticky fingers of the Whips Office, because it saw the whole idea of any public—or, at least, more formal—discussion with Opposition parties about the format of the legislative programme as reducing its nefarious powers. It is no wonder that some Labour Members talk about the Whips Office as the dark forces of retrograde action.

Finally, it is time that we did something about the mishomer "strangers"—at least formally in our Standing Orders. I do not care who says what in Central Lobby when the Speaker's procession goes through—whether they say "Hats off, strangers" or "Hats off, visitors". Incidentally, as only strangers are required to remove their hats it implies that all Members are still wearing theirs. That is a bit anachronistic, too. I have a drawing by the great Phil May of a Member, complete with his top hat, sitting in the place currently occupied by the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie). We no longer wear them, although the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst may wish that we did. We move on, and the time has come for us to say more honestly and openly that those who send us here have the right to be treated as part of the body politic rather than as strangers to it.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No, I am about to finish.

The report is extremely important. It is evidence-based and the Committee has taken infinite trouble. It is supported by all the parties represented on the Committee and there is to be a free vote. I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will be able to give an assurance, perhaps endorsed by one of his Front-Bench Treasury colleagues, that no guidance—I use the word advisedly—will be given to Labour Members when the Divisions take place today, and that all Members on both sides of the House will vote as their consciences, rather than the Whips, dictate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am grateful to be called, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am also extremely grateful to you and to the Speaker for selecting the amendments tabled by the Procedure Committee. I emphasise that they were tabled by all parties represented on the Committee.

I shall refer briefly to the speech made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). We may be political opponents, but I respect her as an outstanding parliamentarian who has made a huge contribution during the many years she has served in this place. She is a true democrat who, in debates such as this, represents the best interests of the House as a whole, not of her party or of the Opposition, and that is of paramount importance.

I thank the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) for his support for the Procedure Committee's recommendations. That shows that the Committee can obtain support across the House for its reasonable proposals, for the benefit of the House and its job of scrutinising legislation and holding to account the Government of the day.

I shall speak to the amendments. Is it your wish that I move them formally later on, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I find it difficult to give advice to the hon. Gentleman, who is

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

Chairman of the Procedure Committee, but it would be appropriate to move the amendments at the end, before the votes are taken.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: That is what I thought, Mr Deputy Speaker, but even after the years I have served in this place, I look to the Chair for reassurance and I am grateful for that reassurance.

I shall concentrate on the amendments and on the two Procedure Committee reports that are the subject of the first two motions. I advise the House that we published our report on the programming of legislation in July. I remind the House that programming was introduced on a consensual—I emphasise that word—basis in 1997, but it is with great sadness that I must note that over the next two years that consensus broke down.

In 2000, the Modernisation Committee recommended a more detailed set of provisions but it implied that programming would still be used—I say this especially to the Deputy Leader of the House—only when there was cross-party agreement. The previous allocation of time orders would be available when necessary where there was no such agreement. To an extent, the Government motions go against the first two recommendations of the Modernisation Committee, by denying that programme motions should be by consensus and that where there was no consensus the previous allocation of time orders would be available.

In fact, the orders introduced by the Government in 2000 include no requirement for cross-party agreement, and most of the time, sadly, it has not been forthcoming, for reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) spelled out in his opening speech. Although there are plenty of examples of day-to-day co-operation, it remains the case that most programme orders are divided on.

The Modernisation Committee reported on programming a year ago. The Leader of the House referred to that report. The aim of the Procedure Committee was to build on the report, take some evidence from Members, and consider whether we could make programming more generally acceptable across the House, either by changing the programming orders or by encouraging a change in the way those orders are used.

There is no inconsistency in opposing the principle of a Government Bill while seeking to agree on the length of time for which it needs to be debated. In our report, which as usual was unanimous, we proposed a number of changes to the Sessional Orders to try to make programming work better for all concerned while providing safeguards—I direct these remarks particularly to the Deputy Leader of the House. The Government's motion does not implement all of them, so we have tabled some amendments—again, with cross-party support—to implement those that they did not accept.

I shall go through the main recommendations in the order in which they are set out in our report.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and his Committee, who have done marvellous work, and I heartily recommend their conclusions to the House.

When I was a Minister, I was keen that there was enough time in Committee for all Back-Bench Members on both sides of the House to make all their points. There is one thing worse for a Minister than having too lively a Committee stage and that is to let a defective piece of legislation go through, thus making the whole Government look silly because it was not properly scrutinised and amended. Does my hon. Friend agree that Ministers, in their own interest, should want more serious debate in Committee to spare them the embarrassment of bad legislation?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I agree wholeheartedly with my right hon. Friend, but I emphasise my concern that, historically, there have been occasions when filibustering, whether by the Government or the Opposition, was the order of the day. That is something that I deeply regret. However, if the House is to do its job, it is essential that adequate time be allocated for proper and full detailed scrutiny of legislation.

Mr. Swayne rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I give way to my hon. Friend, who is a member of my Committee.

Mr. Swayne: My hon. Friend will be aware of the intervention made by the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), based on his experience on a recent Joint Committee on pre-legislative scrutiny. Does my hon. Friend agree that that suggests that more time is needed for Standing Committees? I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that were the recommendations of the right hon. Gentleman's Committee not to be taken, he would have rather more to say if he were subsequently to find himself on the Standing Committee for that Bill. I have been in that position as a member of a Standing Committee; because the Government had not taken account of the arguments made during the pre-legislative scrutiny, we had more to say and thus needed greater time in which to say it.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend raises an interesting issue. My only comment in response is that I fully and warmly support pre-legislative scrutiny. I hope that there will be more of it and that the Government will be more forthcoming in the new Session of Parliament about those measures that will be subject to pre-legislative scrutiny. However, following my hon. Friend's intervention in relation to the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes)—a past Minister in a Labour Government—I will say that Standing Committees are likely to be better informed; thus while the debates may be as long as in the past, they will be better focused and the quality and relevance of debate will be improved.

Mr. Heald: I wonder whether my hon. Friend is aware that the Civil Contingencies Bill underwent pre-legislative scrutiny? At the end of the Standing Committee, the Minister, the Liberal spokesman and I agreed that, in fact, the Standing Committee had been much better as a result of the pre-legislative scrutiny.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend, who speaks from the Opposition Front Bench, merely confirms what I have already said in response to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne). I have spoken at great length to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), whose views on that Bill are very strong, and I suspect that, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he may even mention that Bill in this debate.

Our first recommendation is the subject of amendments (b) and (c). The Procedure Committee believes that there should be some incentive for the parties in the House to agree—yes, to agree—on a programme order. We propose that a programme motion should pass without debate only if it is tabled with the support of three parties, including the Government and the largest Opposition party; otherwise, there should be a one-hour debate. We also suggest that, whether or not there is a debate, there should be an opportunity to take decisions on amendments to programme motions.

The Government's reply suggests that the Opposition parties would continue to oppose programme motions and force an hour's debate on each occasion. I sincerely believe that that would not be the case. By contrast with the Government's view, I would expect the Procedure Committee's proposals to result in a better atmosphere in which both those on the Opposition Front Bench and the Government would negotiate more fully and constructively, so that a debate would seldom, if ever, be necessary. The principle of encouraging agreement by dispensing with a debate when agreement is achieved is recognised elsewhere in the programming orders and in the Standing Orders on regulatory reform orders.

The Procedure Committee thought that programming is introduced to our current procedures too soon. Currently, the Government have to table a programme motion before the debate on Second Reading, thereby fixing an out date for the Standing Committee before even hearing the arguments and assessing the opposition to a Bill. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire. The Procedure Committee recommends that the initial programme motion should not be voted on until 48 hours after the debate on Second Reading. That is also dealt with in amendment (b). I repeat that the programme motion, which we believe should be considered 48 hours after the debate on Second Reading, would be decided by vote, if a vote were necessary, without debate. I see no good reason why the Government could not accept that proposal.

When a Bill is being considered in Standing Committee, there is often a need to make changes to the programme motion, either because the Government have agreed to change the out date or because one of the internal knives needs moving. Currently, such a change necessitates a meeting of the Programming Sub-Committee, sometimes in the middle of a Standing Committee sitting. Often, however, the change proposed has already been negotiated between the parties. We have therefore recommended that the necessary motion should be moved in the Standing Committee itself, unless any Member objects. We are glad that the Government have accepted that recommendation, which appears in paragraph (5) of the motion. That should save time, and it is also for the convenience not only of the House but of the Standing Committee particularly.

Sometimes, however, there may be no time to change the timetable as I suggest. I have in mind occasions when there is a series of Divisions in the House, and when the Committee returns, the time allowed has expired and the Chairman has to put the question straight away. I hope that the Leader of the House will listen to this. We therefore recommend injury time for Divisions in the House. It seems only fair that, if we are given an allocation of time under a programme motion, we should be allowed that full allocation and the Divisions in the House should not be included in that time. We also recommend a general power for the Chairman to delay the falling of a knife by up to 15 minutes for the general convenience of the Committee. Both those recommendations are dealt with in our amendment (d).

One further recommendation that we made—this appears in our amendment (a)—is for a list to be drawn up of the clauses and schedules that have not been discussed in Committee because of the operation of the programme motion. That is intended to inform the debate on Report on the Floor of the House. The Government reply points out that hon. Members could extract that information from the Standing Committee Hansard and in part they are right, but we believe that it would be much more convenient to print it at the back of the amendment paper used on Report.

In particular, I remind the Leader of the House—he did not refer to this in his opening speech—that clause numbers often change after consideration in Committee and that our statement on the rear of the amendment paper could contain the revised numbers. So I hope that the Leader of the House might review his decision on that.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): Would the clauses that a Committee has not discussed be given preference on Report, or would that statement just be for information?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: It is both, but the statement would be primarily for information.

As I am also a member of the Chairmen's Panel, I have chaired a number of Committees in which there has been no delay, no filibustering at all, but time has run out without important clauses and schedules to the Bill being debated. It would help the whole House to have that information and perhaps know the accurate numbers of the clauses and schedules when the Bill is debated on the Floor of the House. I do not propose that in any way to try to delay or protract the debate on Report, but it is important.

As the Leader of the House rightly said, there are occasions when a clause is not fully debated but is voted on there and then because it is not particularly controversial. Often, clauses are passed by agreement, without full debate. I have experienced that many times, but it is wrong when a Standing Committee has not, for lack of time, debated important clauses and schedules or provided any time for new clauses.

The remaining paragraphs of the Government motion implement minor improvements suggested by the Clerks—I am grateful to them—that the Procedure Committee has endorsed.

[Sir Nicholas Winterton]

I should also mention some other recommendations that the Government have accepted, but that do not need any change to the programming orders, including the suggestions that there should usually be as few internal knives as possible, that Standing Committee sittings could, or perhaps should, occasionally be longer if necessary and that Members should keep their speeches reasonably short. The latter suggestion also refers to Ministers who occasional seem to drag out their speeches unnecessarily. We also recommended that Government amendments for debate on the Floor on Report should be tabled in good time, because that is important if the House is to do its job properly at that stage.

The next motion takes note of our report of last November on procedures for debates, private Members' Bills and the powers of the Speaker. It will provide for a two-Session experiment on our proposal to allow an hour of short speeches before the wind-ups. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) for suggesting the proposal when he gave evidence to our Committee. The motion contains the words "three minutes", but I must emphasise to hon. Members, and especially my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), that that would be a minimum time limit.

We recommended that on suitable occasions, the last hour before the wind-ups should be divided equally among Members who had attended most of the debate and were still waiting to speak. The limit would be as short as three minutes only if there were 20 or more such Members. The experiment would build on informal attempts that are often made at present by the Whips and others to fit everyone in before the wind-ups start. Of course, Members would prefer an eight-minute speech to a three-minute speech, but I must suggest rationally that for most hon. Members, a three-minute speech would be better than no speech at all. We also recommended that the same procedure could be applied to the half hour before the wind-ups in a half-day debate.

The Committee's report made several other recommendations that are not the subject of today's motions, but I shall be interested to find out which receive support in the House. We made a proposal about lists of speakers, although I know that the idea is controversial and that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and Mr. Speaker have strong views about it. We suggested the possibility of linking Westminster Hall debates to relevant early-day motions. I should tell the Leader of the House that I fully support the use of Westminster Hall. As a complementary Chamber, it has provided a useful and valuable outlet in which hon. Members may raise issues of importance to them and their constituents and Select Committee reports may be debated. We also recommended that it was time to increase the £200 drafting allowance for the top 10 Members in the ballot on private Members' Bills. I hope that those suggestions will receive the House's attention in due course. The Committee also made recommendations on the Speaker's role in emergency recalls of the House. It is the view of many hon. Members that the recall of the House in an emergency should be in the hands of Mr. Speaker rather than the Government.

The other motions that we are considering do not arise from Procedure Committee reports, so I do not need to cover them—I shall allow other hon. Members who wish to speak to do that. I should, however, talk about the motion on short speeches to which the Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire referred. The proposal would give the Chair greater latitude on who should be exempted from a time limit on speeches. A debate on a Select Committee report will often be initiated by the Government, as is the case today, but the Chairman might be expected to make his report on behalf of the Committee at length. The motion would allow that to happen whenever the Chair thought it appropriate, so I commend it to the House.

I commend both Procedure Committee reports to the House and urge hon. Members to support amendments (a) to (d), and I do so with these final words. I am committed to this House of Commons. I believe that it must be able to do the job that the people who send us here expect it to. That means that the Government of the day must allow the Opposition adequate time to do their job. The Leader of the House was not in the Chamber when I said that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich is an outstanding parliamentarian. She is respected throughout the country for the work that she does not only in the Chamber, but as the Chairman of a Select Committee. Given that she takes her view seriously, as do the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and many other hon. Members, I hope that the votes will be genuinely free and that there will be no pressure on Government Members to support the motions tabled by the Leader of the House. There should be total freedom for Members to exercise their right to ensure that this place remains a democratic assembly and a Parliament in which proper work can be done.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): It is a great privilege to follow the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), for whom I have a great deal of respect. When, as a Minister, I replied to Westminster Hall debates that he chaired, he always treated me with the greatest courtesy and respect, which I greatly appreciated. I also appreciated his remarks today and thought that his arguments on amendment (d) were convincing. I assure him that a gun is not being held to my head on which way to vote, although I will listen to any arguments that the Deputy Leader of the House might make against the amendment.

On the question of the guillotine and filibustering, may I start by saying that some of my colleagues realise that I am not by nature a moderniser?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Ha!

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that.

I opposed the changes to the House's hours, and I still think that they were a mistake, because tremendous problems have been created with double booking and clashes, as I have found today. I want to talk about guillotines and filibustering, because I have a confession to make. When I was an Opposition Back Bencher, I indulged in a great deal of filibustering. That was legitimate, in order within the procedures of the House, and accepted. However, even as I did that for hour after hour, I realised the futility of it all. We did not achieve anything most of the time, except keeping most of us out of bed until the early hours of the morning.

The futility of that process explains why programming is vital. Some Conservative Members are yet to get out of the filibustering mentality. I have served on Committees as both a Minister and a Government Back Bencher in which a great deal of time was allowed to discuss clauses, but Opposition Members inexplicably seemed unable to stop themselves from needlessly going on and on, not asking genuine questions or challenging the Government, but just filling up time. They are unable to get out of that filibustering mentality. We still face that problem. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who used to be shadow Leader of the House, is probably one of the most proficient and continual habitués of that style of debating.

My first and main point relates to pre-legislative scrutiny. Although I do not always agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), as she knows, I do respect her experience here, to which the hon. Member for Macclesfield referred. The House showed that it can exercise independent spirit when it re-elected her as Chairman of the Transport Committee, irrespective of what the Government said. However, she and the hon. Members for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) have not fully taken account of the important change that has come about with pre-legislative scrutiny, which I hope will be used more often.

I served on the Joint Committee on the draft Charities Bill, which revealed the practical effects of pre-legislative scrutiny. When we went through the Bill, we took evidence from people who understood the issues—private schools, private hospitals, Oxfam, Age Concern and other bodies and small charities in towns and villages throughout the country—and we made a number of recommendations. The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) said that such scrutiny will extend the debate in Standing Committee. I do not think that that is the case. As the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire said, we will be better informed and understand the issues better. We will not ask questions for the sake of it on something to which we already know the answer. Pre-legislative scrutiny will narrow down the things on which there is division, so that there is time to debate those matters on which there is a real difference of opinion and real concern.

Mr. Swayne: May I give the right hon. Gentleman the benefit of my experience on the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Bill, on which we had the benefit of the report and the recommendations of the pre-legislative scrutiny phase? It was precisely because the Government had not implemented the recommendations that we were able, armed with the report and the evidence of which he has spoken, to put our arguments more effectively, but that takes time. It is a better-quality debate, but it is not shorter as a consequence of pre-legislative scrutiny.

Mr. Foulkes: It may not be shorter on individual issues, but it will narrow down the range of issues on which debate is necessary, although we have yet to see how the Government respond to our report on the draft Charities Bill. I chaired the last sitting of the Joint Committee because my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) was moved into the Government. We managed to get all-party consensus on a number of divisive issues. I think that many of our recommendations will be accepted by the Government and we will have narrowed down the things that need to be considered in detail in Standing Committee.

Mr. Forth: It may well be that pre-legislative scrutiny has a value, but surely it can never replace the legislative role of a Standing Committee, of which the members are likely to be completely or substantially different from those who carried out the pre-legislative scrutiny. For the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that because one group has done excellent work beforehand, a completely different group, with a different role, can do less work cannot be right. They are complementary and do not replace one another.

Mr. Foulkes: I agree that pre-legislative scrutiny does not replace the proper legislative scrutiny on which we, as elected Members of Parliament, have ultimately to take the decision. What I am saying is that it will narrow down the opportunities for division. I also hope that members of a Standing Committee will not be completely different from those who served on the Joint Committee. We are talking about procedure, and the whole issue is open for discussion. It would be sensible for someone from the Joint Committee to serve on the Standing Committee. We can learn a number of things from the Scottish Parliament, including its experience of pre-legislative scrutiny, which helps to shorten the time that is needed for proper scrutiny.

I freely confess that I was as guilty as anyone of filibustering when the time was available, but I realised the futility of it.

Mr. Redwood: It was not as futile as the right hon. Gentleman thinks. I was a member of that Government, with a large majority. We left the Opposition the weapon of time, which meant that the Government had to think carefully about which contentious issues it wished to bring to the House and it limited the number of contentious issues that we could put through. This Government have removed that important check and balance.

Mr. Foulkes: I wish we had limited the number of contentious issues the Thatcher Government put through, but I am afraid that we did not. It was one after another after another. They were bashed through with the guillotine. I think that the right hon. Gentleman was a member of the Government who imposed a guillotine on Maastricht and the Single European Act. I remember that well because Lord Robertson and I dealt with it on the Front Bench, and we actually sat on a Friday because the Government were so intent on pushing it through. Secondly, on the carry-over of Bills, I take the same kind of radical view as my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). I do not understand why a Government elected for the duration of a Parliament cannot carry-over their legislative programme during that period.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My right hon. Friend has been a member of the Government, so he knows that if inadequate legislation is introduced and the Government, for one reason or another, do not want to stick with it, one of the easiest and most comfortable ways of getting themselves out of a difficult corner is simply to let it lapse on the pretext that there is not enough time, and introduce better legislation at the beginning of the next Session. Not only have our Government done so consistently, but as far as I can remember, Conservative and other Governments have done so in the past 30 years.

Mr. Foulkes: We have got into that mindset. I have served on legislative programming committees in which the previous Lord Chancellor—I had better be careful what I say—submitted Ministers to something similar to the Star Chamber, to make sure that the legislation that we were introducing was as good as possible. There will always be problems with legislation, but other Parliaments manage to introduce carry-over Bills. There is an argument that in Britain the Commons and the Lords have always introduced fresh legislation in each Session, but I have not heard a logical argument why we should not carry over legislation and why Governments should not be able to introduce Bills throughout a Parliament. We have antiquated arrangements, and the House, for example, sits at times of the year when it is illogical to do so. Instead of having several Queen's Speeches during a Parliament it would be sensible to have one at the beginning to outline the legislative programme, and in the process save an awful lot of time, money and inconvenience. There is no logical argument against my proposal, which is more radical than a simple carry-over of Bills.

Thirdly, on the 10-minute limit, I try to make short speeches, as you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, although I must watch myself today. It is possible to make as effective a speech in eight or nine minutes as it is in 15 or 20.

Mr. Forth: The right hon. Gentleman has not done so this afternoon.

Mr. Foulkes: I have taken interventions, so I accept the right hon. Gentleman's criticism. Usually, however, when tackling a single subject, Members can make an effective speech within 10 minutes.

Finally, I am happy to remove references to strangers. There is a wonderful establishment in Dalrymple in my constituency called the Kirkton Inn. On the menu, the door, the doormat is the message, "Strangers are only friends you have not yet met." That is a nice sentiment, even though it is has nothing to do with our debate. Perhaps I can send a copy of Hansard to the Kirkton Inn. I have never understood why we use the term "strangers"—let us call such people visitors or the public. For goodness' sake, however, let us not call them the general public. As I said at the beginning of my speech, I am not known as a great moderniser, but I agree with the Government's proposals, apart from their recommendations on Order D, against which the hon. Member for Macclesfield argued convincingly. Without any pressure from the Government, I can say that their proposals are very sensible indeed.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): There is one thing at least on which the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) and I agree: the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made an excellent speech. I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in all that he said, although I shall probably pick up some of his points later.

People in this country labour under a great misconception, which is shared by a good number of hon. Members—that is, that Parliament governs the country. How often do people say to us at surgeries, "Well, you govern the country"? Parliament, as we know, does not. Parliament exists to hold the Government to account and to try to supervise those who have been charged with the government of the country. What we are debating today—it is the most important part of our debate—is how we hold the Government effectively to account and maintain an orderly discipline of our business.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and his Committee have performed a signal service in the report that they produced. The House would be well advised, in a free vote, to accept the recommendations and to reject firmly the changes that the Leader of the House and his colleague wish to insert in the report. In effect, the Leader of the House is emasculating many of the recommendations suggested in a unanimous report by my hon. Friend and his colleagues on an all-party Committee. They have tried to reconcile the understandable desire and need of any Government to get their business through with the absolute necessity for Parliament thoroughly to examine and properly to scrutinise the legislation put before it.

The Deputy Leader of the House is nodding vigorously. I have great regard for him and for his colleague, the Leader of the House. Whether inadvertently or not, what the Government have recommended to the House today is inimical to what my hon. Friend and his colleagues propose. The Government should think again. If they are not prepared to do so, I hope that when he winds up the Deputy Leader of the House will give us a reassurance that there is to be a truly free vote and that every Labour Member, including every member of the Government, is free to vote in whichever Lobby he or she pleases. We are considering a House of Commons matter and it is important for it to be resolved by the House of Commons.

I was half-grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), the shadow Leader of the House, for his response to my pointed intervention. He did not come the whole way, but I hope he will when, with your leave, Madam Deputy Speaker, he winds up the debate. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend says he did not think he was going to do that. I hope he will, so that he can say what I am about to suggest. It is important that the Opposition make it plain that if we are returned to government next year, which I hope and believe we will be, the recommendations of the Procedure Committee will be resurrected and placed before the House with the full support of the Government of the day.

I am one of the few Members present in the Chamber who has been here a very long time but has never served in government. I have briefly served on the Opposition Front Bench, but never in government. I have been critical of my own party in government when it imposed guillotines. I have spoken and voted against them because it is crucial that every Government recognise their accountability to Parliament and do not seek to undermine that accountability.

Mr. Heald: I had not thought that I would necessarily wind up the debate, but I can assure my hon. Friend that we ought to be able to do at least as well as the proposals of the Procedure Committee to meet the needs of the House in order for it to scrutinise legislation properly. I hope he will find the manifesto proposals satisfactory when they are produced.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield and I will be consulted when that portion of the manifesto is drafted, just to be sure that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire has got it right.

This debate is important, and it is sad that more hon. Members are not present to discuss how best to hold the Government to account. Having made my points about the Procedure Committee's major report, and having fully endorsed its recommendations, let me pass briefly on to some of the other subjects that we are discussing this afternoon—I seek not only to emulate but perhaps even to better the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley in making a brief speech.

I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield and his Committee for accepting my proposal, which I put to them in written and oral evidence, for a brief period during debates to provide an opportunity for spontaneous utterance. The increasing tendency for hon. Members to read their speeches is one of the things that has saddened me during my membership of this House. That tendency destroys proper debate, just as the rigorous imposition of time limits may destroy it.

I have often felt a sense of frustration—I am sure that you felt it too before you reached your elevated position, Madam Deputy Speaker—when I have sat through a debate but have not been called. Worst of all, if one sits in a debate and suddenly feels moved to make a contribution, the dice are loaded against those who have not written to the Speaker to ask to take part.

In that spirit of sympathetic and empathetic frustration, and I think particularly of newer hon. Members, I recommended to the Procedure Committee that a portion of each debate—an hour or half an hour depending on the length of the debate—should be used to allow hon. Members who have been assiduous in their attendance, but who have not necessarily written to the Speaker, to catch the Speaker's eye and make a brief contribution.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield emphasised that the three minutes is the minimum time limit—on some occasions, it could be five, six, seven, eight or perhaps even 10 minutes. For one hour, hon. Members who have a contribution to make can make it. I am delighted that that recommendation features in the report and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield and his colleagues. I hope that the experiment is successful—it is rightly an experiment—and that it will pass into the practice of this House.

I do not like deferred Divisions—I have voted against them in the past and will vote against them again tonight. In a spirit of honesty, however, I must say that we are having deferred Divisions today and that many hon. Members will troop through the Lobbies tonight not having heard a word of the debate, which undermines the argument.

Returning to my point about short and spontaneous speeches, the opportunity to make a short, spontaneous speech should provide a greater incentive to attend the Chamber. The most unfortunate thing about this Chamber is its progressive depopulation over the years. When I was first elected in 1970, the House was nearly always full for the winding-up speeches and the opening speeches, whatever the subject of the debate, which is not the case now.

It was always the courteous custom that hon. Members who spoke stayed for the following two speeches and came in for both winding-up speeches, unless they had another parliamentary commitment. That custom has gone away from us—courtesy has departed from the House and fewer hon. Members attend the Chamber. I hope that my proposal, which my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield endorses, will have some effect. I shall vote against deferred Divisions, because anything that encourages absence is not to be commended.

I share the view that Bills should be carried over, but only with the Opposition's consent, which is important. Some Bills are terribly important and very complex, but not necessarily contentious in a party political sense. They deserve the closest and most lengthy scrutiny, and nothing should prevent their being carried over. However, that must not become a Government's excuse for rushing through bodged legislation and then pushing it into the next Session because they have not had quite enough time to get it through in the current one.

I very much disagree with the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, who wants only one State Opening in a Parliament. No Government are so prescient that they know what is going to happen in the next four or five years, so there is a need for an annual review and introduction of legislation for the following year.

I will say very little about short speeches. Chairmen of Select Committees should not be given an inordinate amount of time, but they need enough to explain the reports and recommendations of their Committees, and that cannot be done in eight or ten minutes.

I want to conclude by saying a few words about the final motion. One of the curses of the age is political correctness. Any institution, be it a school, a club or a university has, to some degree, its own vocabulary; and part of our vocabulary is the word "strangers". Having entertained friends and visitors in this House for almost 35 years, I have never—I say this emphatically—heard anyone complain about their reception. No one has felt ostracised or unwelcome; many, however, have commented to the contrary or said that they rather like the slightly quaint vocabulary that we sometimes use. They do not mind being called strangers—they do not see that as a mark of opprobrium but take it in the same spirit as those who patronise the hostelry in Carrick, Cumnock or Doon Valley that we heard about.

Mr. Tyler rose—

Sir Patrick Cormack: Of course I give way to the hon. Gentleman, because I shall have something to say about him in a minute.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman; I hope that he will allow me to intervene again afterwards.

I bow to the hon. Gentleman's superior quaintness, and I understand the point that he is making, but he should recognise that the proposal did not come out of thin air: it came from the Modernisation Committee, which took very careful evidence, particularly from young people, who feel that certain words are now anomalous and anachronistic. Calling those who send us here strangers is certainly an example of that.

Sir Patrick Cormack: That is part of the patronising condescension that makes people want to put Shakespeare into modern English and to abandon the Book of Common Prayer. It was all right for George III to go around talking to trees, but the hon. Gentleman goes around talking to chairs, such is his succumbing to the mood of political correctness.

All this nonsense reminds me of one of Churchill's famous quips. At the end of the war he was told that one should not call the homes that were being built in this country homes, because some of them were quite small—they should be called accommodation units. Churchill leaned back in his chair and said, "Accommodation unit, sweet accommodation unit. What rubbish." How right he was. This is an example of that rubbish. Those who come here, our constituents and others, are very welcome. This is the Parliament of those who live in this country, and it always will be. They send us here and we are answerable to them, just as the Government are answerable to us in this Chamber.

If we think that by tinkering with the word "strangers" we are helping to give the people the Parliament they deserve, we are deluding ourselves and, indeed, guilty of a massive confidence trick. Our duty in this Chamber is to have an effective Parliament that represents the people's interests and holds the Government to account. We shall serve those interests by voting freely, firmly and decisively for the Procedure Committee's recommendations and by eschewing the syntactic nonsense in motion 7.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), who spoke briefly and without notes—a model to us all. I propose to make the briefest speech in the debate.

The right hon. Member for the triple-barrelled constituency of Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) said that he hoped that pre-legislative scrutiny might reduce the amount of time spent in Committee. If he examines the record, he will realise that the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 was subjected to a joint Committee of both Houses but subsequently spent an inordinate time in Committee. I wonder whether the fact that the Gambling Bill has been to a joint Committee will reduce the time that it needs in Standing Committee. The jury is out on whether pre-legislative scrutiny reduces the time that is needed for the Standing Committee stage.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am a member of Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which examined the draft Animal Welfare Bill. There have been an enormous number of sittings on the draft Bill and I firmly believe that the quality of the measure that reaches the statute book will be significantly improved by the prodigious efforts of those involved.

Sir George Young: I do not doubt that, but it was not my point. Will that scrutiny reduce the amount of time that the Standing Committee spends on the draft Bill?

David Taylor: It may not.

Sir George Young: Indeed, but that was the argument that the Leader of the House adduced and that I question.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) for producing a readable report that those of us who are not experts on procedure found easy to follow. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire said, the Procedure Committee and its report set the framework in which we conduct our debates and hold the Government to account. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield has assisted us in that task by shining a procedural torch in some dark constitutional corners.

I preface my remarks by pointing out that two Select Committees produce reports on procedure—the Modernisation Committee and the Procedure Committee. Is it the best use of scarce resources for two Select Committees to produce reports on procedure?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: At the risk of contradicting my commitment to make the shortest speech, I shall give way.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Has not the right hon. Gentleman missed the point? A Cabinet Minister chairs one of the Committees.

Sir George Young: That is exactly the point that I was about to make. I make no apologies for repeating a view that I have expressed previously. The Leader of the House should not chair the Modernisation Committee because there is a clear conflict of interest. The Leader of the House is in the Cabinet, with the mandate of getting the Government's legislative programme through the House of Commons. The Modernisation Committee has produced recommendations that are different from those of the Procedure Committee. That underlines the fact that they come from different viewpoints.

The role of the House is different from that of the Leader of the House. Our job is to scrutinise the Government's legislative programme and hold the Government to account. Our system is short-circuited if the Leader of the House is also Chairman of the Select Committee that makes recommendations about the rules for processing that programme. It is the only Select Committee that is chaired by a Minister. Without being personal about the current Leader of the House, he should stop leading that Committee. We should have one Select Committee instead of two, it should be called the "Strengthening of Parliament Committee" and someone who is not a member of the Government should chair it.

Let me consider the reports. The mood today is different from the mood in the previous Parliament. With respect to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), the mood is perhaps different from that of a year ago. It makes sense to adopt a less confrontational approach to programming Bills. From the Government's point of view, it makes sense to keep in their locker ammunition that they may need to secure the passage of their programme. However, they do not have to deploy it the whole time. We should experiment with a less restrictive regime in the interests of better scrutiny.

For example, the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill went through the House without a procedural shot being fired. In the next Session, we should experiment with having more Bills without programming, thus going back to the pre-1997 regime, which worked perfectly well for many of us. If it is abused, the Government have the resources that they need to get their Bills through. En passant, I point out that we can examine Bills properly if the Government produce a digestible legislative programme. This is the right point at which to ask the Leader of the House, as he draws up the Loyal Address, not to overburden the House. That lies behind some of the problems that we have seen in recent years. I know that when my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) draws up the Loyal Address in six months' time, he will ensure that a Conservative Administration have a digestible programme to be delivered without the programme motions of which we have seen too much in recent years.

On length of speeches, many speeches are far too long, particularly Front-Bench speeches. The longer Front-Bench speeches go on, the more Back Benchers realise that they will not be called, so the more interventions they make to get their views on the record, thereby aggravating the original problem. For written material for the Minister, 20 minutes is too long; 15 minutes is perfectly adequate, with five minutes for interventions. Yesterday, we had a fairly typical series of half-day debates. We had an hour and a half for the three Front-Bench speeches on university admissions, which is disproportionate.

There is a proposal that the Speaker should exempt additional Members from any time limit on speeches. I view that with a little suspicion—the size of the cake will remain the same for everyone else, and the slices will get a little smaller. I understand the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire that the Chairmen of Select Committees need time and space to speak to their report, but in one sense the House already knows their views as they are capsulated in the report: it is everyone else who has not had the opportunity to say anything about the subject. The debate on the Floor of the House is the first chance that the rest of us have to contribute.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I feel challenged by my right hon. Friend. Would he speculate on how many hon. Members read every Select Committee report? I would have said that the number was very small.

Sir George Young: I would hope that Members who sought to catch Mr. Speaker's eye in a debate on a Select Committee report would have done the House the courtesy of reading it. I am prepared to support my hon. Friend's recommendation on approval, as it were, not for the reason that he gave but because, over the past few years, the House has tried to develop an alternative structure so that the Government do not hoover up all the talent, and we have started to pay some Select Committee Chairmen. That proposal is part of rebalancing the power in the House by enhancing the role of Select Committee Chairmen. On that basis, I am prepared to support it, but I hope that it will not be abused.

A recommendation in one of the reports, which has not been mentioned, is that attention should be paid to the number of signatures on early-day motions in deciding what subjects should be selected for debate in Westminster Hall. I confess that I am not a fan of early-day motions; they have become a greatly devalued currency, and I do not sign them. If my constituents want me to make my views known to the Government, I prefer to write a letter to the Minister. If the recommendation were adopted, it would add to the pressure on all of us to add our names to early-day motions. I question whether that is a sensible way forward.

I have nothing against carry-over. I regard the legislative programme as being like a motorway—what we want to avoid is rush hours, and at the moment we have a rush hour at the beginning of the Session with all the Second Readings. We would make better use of the legislative process if we more evenly distributed Bills throughout the year.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: Yes, actually I was supporting the Deputy Leader of the House.

Mr. Woolas: My reason for requesting an intervention was to emphasise that support, for which I am grateful. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he agrees that the London bus syndrome, as it has been described, does not just affect us in Parliament but parliamentary counsel? One of the advantages of carry-over is that parliamentary counsel's resources are, in effect, increased. In my limited experience, that means that better legislation is enacted.

Sir George Young: Yes. I would be tempted to go down the route of saying that we should privatise parliamentary counsel, and not be restricted to the use of the ones that we have at the moment.

The Committee makes it absolutely clear that carry-over should only be done with cross-party consent—I intervened on the Leader of the House, as did my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire, to seek an assurance that the Government would not use carry-over without cross-party consent. The Standing Order changes allow them to do that. The assurance that I received was not 100 per cent. If the Deputy Leader of the House can assure me further on that in his reply, I would be grateful. I also think that the Government should identify carry-over Bills at their inception rather than deciding halfway through a Session, when they get into trouble, that a Bill needs to be carried over.

I was against deferred Divisions when they were introduced, and, like my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire, I am against them now. I consider them to be one of the factors that help to bring this institution into disrepute. I do not think that there should be too big a gap between a debate and a Division, and I shall vote against deferred Divisions.

We have not spent too much time arguing about the term "strangers" as applied to visitors, which I think is a good thing. The more time we spend arguing about what we should call people, the more detached from the real world our constituents will believe us to be. I cannot get frightfully excited about it—it hits me right on my indifference curve—but it is worth noting that the only mention of today's debate in the press has related to it.

My final exhortation is this: let us make up our minds quickly and move on, because there are more important matters for the House to discuss.

5.6 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): The only protection that the public have from an over-mighty Government legislating too much and legislating badly is provided by Members of Parliament in both Chambers, but particularly Members of the House of Commons.

As a Minister in a Government who had a big majority when I joined them, I was very conscious of the fact that leaving the weapon of time in the hands of the Opposition imposed an important constraint on that Government's ability to over-legislate, to legislate in haste or to legislate badly. Ministers had to agonise over the scarce resource of parliamentary time to pass legislation, and rightly so. Now the weapon of time has largely been taken away from the Opposition parties and from Back Benchers from the governing party. The Government no longer need take account of the scarceness of legislative time. They need not work so hard to decide what they really want to do, and to ensure that their legislation is well drafted and well thought through. I think that that is a bad development.

There are two main ways in which legislation can be tested, honed and perfected. The first rests particularly heavily on the shoulders of Ministers. I am glad to say that when I was a Minister I did not have to legislate very often. I was always quite reluctant to legislate, feeling that we had quite enough laws already. When I was required to do so, however, I felt that I had a strong duty to go through any draft proposals likely to come to the House in great detail with those who had drafted them and those who advised on them, in order to test them. I did not want to bring to the House of Commons badly drafted legislation that would be exposed and made to look foolish by other Members, and would then need lengthy and elaborate amendment.

Even a Minister who tried to do the job seriously was sometimes forced into amendment by events, by good points made in Committee or by pressures within collective government; but I think that the first line of defence against bad legislation must be the Minister. In recent years Ministers have found it quite easy to get legislation through the House of Commons. They have realised that large amounts of a Bill will not be debated at all, and have become very sloppy. I do not feel that all Ministers—there are some notable exceptions—have the same earnest intent as those who tackled the issue behind closed doors with their officials and draftsmen, so that legislation would be in a reasonable state when it reached the House.

That is demonstrated by the large number of new clauses and pages that are regularly proposed at a very late stage in a Bill's progress, when it is realised—usually by Government officials rather than a Minister—that the Bill has been badly drafted. Pressure groups outside have finally got to grips with it, and have advised the officials; they in turn make Ministers revise, but they have to revise in a big way.

The second big line of defence for the public who will be affected by legislation is the Standing Committee, along with the wider meetings of the House on Second and Third Readings and, particularly, on Report. The Committee stage is, I think, the most important. Any sensible Minister would not wish to truncate good debate on difficult issues in a Bill. Of course the Committee stage should not be dominated by political disagreements and long speeches that verge on filibuster. The Chair deals with true filibuster, but we all know when Members are being clever enough to stay just within the limits while not using all the time as well as they might. Any Government with a majority have an easy way of dealing with that. Of course, any Government have the ultimate right to curtail debate and to introduce a timetable motion, but it should be the exception rather than the rule, and the Government should have to fight for it and to prove beyond peradventure to reasonable people that it is necessary to take that action because of the conduct of the Committee.

In Committee, a guillotine and individual knives often limit debate on individual clauses and other provisions. Debate could genuinely go on, to the benefit of the Minister as well the Committee, on particular parts of a Bill but it is simply not allowed because the guillotine is too prescriptive and is not thought through well—often, it is impossible in advance to think through how much debate is needed on clause 1, clause 2 clause 3 and the relevant amendments pertaining to those clauses.

Therefore, I urge the Minister even at this late stage to understand the mood of the House of Commons today. It is not one of party political antagonism to the Minister and the Government. It was beautifully expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), by his Committee and by hon. Members on both sides of the House who have spoken. The mood is that the Government have simply got the balance wrong, in respect not just of the Opposition and Back Benchers from the governing party but of the people who will be affected by the legislation and Ministers themselves.

There is no mileage for a Minister in being able to prove that he or she has rammed a Bill through in record time, if a year later he or she or a successor has to come back to the House and "I am very sorry"—well, they often do not say sorry—"but we got it all wrong and we need to change the legislation. It was done in haste. We now need to legislate again." It is far better from the Government's point of view if the House of Commons is allowed to do its job properly. That means not guillotining all these proposals. That means allowing sensible debate by hon. Members on both sides of the House, particularly in Committee, so that the double filters work. The Minister will then scrutinise the legislation more carefully before introducing it and the Committee will do the job properly. I urge the Committee to understand the mood of the House and Government to understand the mood of the House and to realise that, in all our interests, to have a great Parliament we need time to do the job properly.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): I should like to make one or two observations without reprising many years of debate on the subject. The shadow Leader of the House said that the Government had a right to get their business. No constitutional principle has ever accepted that in the past. It cannot be so. The very purpose of Parliament is to examine the propositions that the Executive put before it. What does that mean for Labour MPs who oppose top-up fees, for example? Why do they oppose it if the Government have that right?

That understanding of the rights of Government by this House, as expressed by the shadow Leader of the House, is a profound misunderstanding of the purpose of the House. It plays into the hands of a Government who say, "We must get this business." The whole point of the House is to examine business, which is what has lain behind these debates for many years.

When we were in government, I used to analyse and to speak against the very few guillotines—I now look back on those days with regret—that were imposed in Mrs. Thatcher's heyday. They are nothing to the number of guillotines now. In their first year, the new Labour Government imposed more guillotines than were imposed in the 11 years of Mrs. Thatcher's premiership. It has now become a matter of routine. The House acquiesces in the business being programmed, as it is euphemistically called. In his second fine memorandum, which is included in the report of the Procedure Committee, the Deputy Speaker identifies those arguments, which go back four or five years. We are not much further forward. It has been the Government's shameless intention throughout that all the business in this House be determined by them: not just general debates and specific Bills, but even matters such as the time allocated for their consideration.

It was fascinating to discover in the Leader of the House's very shallow presentation that no reference was made to the facts. Under his leadership, the Modernisation Committee presented a report in 2002 that set out the details of the operation of programme orders in previous Sessions. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) for updating that information. What do we discover about Parliament's ability to discuss legislation? Table A on page 5, on the operation of programme orders for the Communications Bill during the 2002–03 Session, shows the number of clauses or schedules stand part that were not reached because of the knife, a concept that we did not have some years ago. Only 105 were not reached, after all, so what does it matter?

What happened to the Communications Bill on Report? Consideration on Report used to be the vital point at which every Member of this House could contribute to the debate on an issue affecting their constituents. Three knives came into play and, as is shown under the heading seven such groups were not reached.

> "Groups/Third reading not reached because of knife"

We should also consider the very important Criminal Justice Bill, which was introduced the following day. Such legislation is central, in that it consists of measures that could send our constituents to prison and make criminal offences of certain acts; indeed, it guides this country's social, economic and political context in terms of criminal law. The Government provided 32 sittings for that Bill; how very generous! Seventy-one groups were not reached because of the knife, and 106 clauses and schedules stand part were not reached for that reason. Bravo! On Report, 11 knives came into play, and 13 such groups were not reached.

I could go on; the situation is indeed absurd. My hon. Friends have served on such Bills, as have new Labour Members. On the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill, 58 groups were not reached because of the knife and 73 clauses and schedules stand part were not reached. Such information underlines the effectiveness or otherwise of this approach, and undermines the proud claims of those who believe in what are politely called programme motions, but which, in truth, are indistinguishable from guillotines, as is acknowledged in Mr. Deputy Speaker's memorandum.

Mr. Swayne: The position is worse than my hon. Friend suggests. For every one of those examples, other clauses and groups of amendments were rushed through and given insufficient attention because Members were racing to reach a particular stage, or to make a point that they wished to make, before the knife fell.

Mr. Shepherd: I am truly grateful to my hon. Friend, who is a member of the Procedure Committee. That Committee used to be considered the most senior of all Committees, in the sense that it dealt with a matter of great importance to us all as ordinary Back Benchers and Members of this House; there is no disputing that fact. My hon. Friend's understanding of such matters has given greater flesh to the bones of an argument that I am making, have made and will continue to make during my parliamentary career. I agree absolutely with what he is saying, and we know the practice to which he refers.

We in this House often speak as if we have created some paradise, yet it is now insignificant in people's minds but for an occasional outburst on issues such as war. This will be the Parliament of war; that is what this issue is really about. Our deliberations on matters such as communications, criminal justice, planning and compulsory purchase and local government are not considered properly in Committee; they are truncated and half-done. They are the background to what is now the majesty and presumption of Executive Government.

The House has a personality. I have tried to make the point that we are all only temporary Members here. Others will succeed us, as others have preceded us. The present Government are just part of the passage of the long life of a nation. The central function of the rules—the rules, like court rules, that govern the way in which we contest the propositions of Executive Government—is to be more permanent.

When the electorate vote, they are effectively settling the question of who should be the Executive, but that is all. They are not settling the detail of page 83 of a manifesto. The electorate cannot possibly know the precise intentions of the Government's Criminal Justice Bill or be aware of the 106 clauses and schedules, stand parts and so on that were not reached. They do not know, so our job is to tickle out and challenge. That is the job of every Member of this House of Commons who is not a member of the Executive: to satisfy themselves, on behalf of their constituents, whether something is appropriate or right. That is our purpose and function.

I seek no office, but I want to know that I am a free man in a free country, in which I can say to the leader of the Government, "You are wrong, and here are the reasons why". However, these scheduling arrangements, timetables and guillotines deny the representative of Aldridge-Brownhills, the triple-barrelled constituency in Ayrshire or wherever the opportunity to examine the details.

I was not intending to make a long speech, because the House has been wearied by my views on this matter for a long period.

Mr. Heald: No, no.

Mr. Shepherd: I am glad to hear the shadow Leader of the House say, "No, no, no, no". He is right to say that, but he is wrong to accept the principle that the Government have a right to get their business through. If so, why do we bother to examine it? That is the heart of the argument: we examine it, because it is important. If it is wrong, it is important to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the House and the country that it is wrong. It is the country that we are talking to in the Chamber, but no one listens because there is no point. We are not actually doing our job because we are voting for a structure of rules, which Mr. Speaker is obliged by the Orders of the House to enforce, that denies us that right.

It is truly curious when the Leader of the House does not argue that there are merits in his proposition. What is happening? Cicero said a long time ago that those who knew nothing of the time before they were born would for ever remain a child. The Leader of the House demonstrated that in spades. He came in only 10 years ago, yet feels fully competent to talk about how the House was managed 20 years ago. I defer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) because her experience of the movement of the House over the years is deeper and longer than mine.

Mr. Heald: I fully accept my hon. Friend's rebuke, but surely he would agree that the Government were entitled to get their business through if, after properly debating the matters before the House, they could command a majority.

Mr. Shepherd: Indeed. Governments have that expectation; after all, it is only the Government who represent the majority in the House. However, there was no caveat whatever in what my hon. Friend said. What of the condition that the Government have to meet the test? After all, the Government do not always command all their own supporters; Government Members can, by working with us, with the Liberal Democrats and the nationalists, defeat a Government. I have seen it happen.

I wish to make two further points. One Bill greatly exercised me and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg): the Civil Contingencies Bill. There was no dispute about clause 1, but clause 2 proposed giving to a Government powers that had never been known outside wartime.

For whatever reason, members of the Opposition Front Bench were so terrified of being accused by the Government that they were not solid in the fight against terrorism that they did not vote against clause 2. That disappointed me, but what happened under the present arrangements? On Report, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham and I were denied the opportunity of pointing out that the Bill's definition of an emergency was inadequate, that property could be confiscated with or without compensation and that a junior Minister could suspend primary legislation.

Mr. Redwood: A Whip could do it.

Mr. Shepherd: As my right hon. Friend says, the Bill meant that a Whip could do it.

The proposals amounted to a profound assault on the central civil liberties of our people, but my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham and I were not reached in the debate. Our amendments were not selected for discussion. We were therefore left with 10 minutes on Third Reading, after the Front Bench Members of all parties had put their oar in, in which we could stand up and say, "This ain't right." We divided the House, and the tragedy of that Division is that it was the two of us against 659 other hon. Members.

I feel strongly about our civil liberties. We are nothing if we have no regard for our freedoms and where they come from. Those freedoms were originated by others, not by us, and yet we give them away so casually. Members of my own Front Bench would not even walk into a Lobby to deny the principle demanded by the Government that items could be confiscated with or without compensation.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend holds views that I greatly respect, and is making a speech that I hope will be widely read. However, is he not making the case that there should be no programme motion affecting the Report stage of a Bill? As Chairman of the Procedure Committee, I am very interested in this matter, as other members of that Committee will be. Is not the Report stage the only opportunity available to all Members of the House to contribute to the debate on a measure? After all, hon. Members may not have been called to speak on Second Reading, or selected to sit on the Standing Committee considering the Bill. Is not the Report stage the only truly Parliament-wide opportunity for hon. Members to contribute to the debate on a Bill? That is especially important when a Bill is as important as the Civil Contingencies Bill, to which my hon. Friend referred.

Mr. Shepherd: Of course I am making that case. I am also making, in part, the case put forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). There is no need for guillotines. It should not be the Government's first presumption that they must guillotine every piece of legislation that comes before the House. Our procedures work without guillotines. I remember, as I said, that there were some 43 guillotines under Mrs. Thatcher and that subordinate guillotines took the figure to about 60.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May I reinforce the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton)? Nomination to Standing Committees is controlled to a large extent by the Whips, who are generally unwilling to nominate hon. Members from their own party unless they are considered reliable. Those of us who are somewhat idiosyncratic in our approach to party discipline do not always find ourselves nominated. As a result, the Report stage is the only real opportunity for hon. Members like us to address the detail of a Bill.

Mr. Shepherd: Indeed. A Standing Committee is merely a subordinate instrument of this House, which enables the House to discharge more business than would otherwise be possible.

Mr. Woolas: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman very carefully, but I remind the House that an hon. Member can attend and speak in a sitting of a Standing Committee even though he is not a member of that Committee.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you confirm that that is the case? My understanding is that the Deputy Leader of the House is not correct. An hon. Member cannot attend a Standing Committee considering a Bill unless he is a member of that Committee. Indeed, that was the substance of the row involving my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) in respect of the Bill that became the Criminal Justice and Police Act 200[illegible] She was ejected from the Committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): That is my understanding of the matter, but I think that we should now proceed with the debate.

Mr. Shepherd: I was grateful for that intervention by the Deputy Leader of the House, because he betrayed all the characteristics of new Labour. As Cicero said,

> "Those who know nothing of the time before they were born will remain forever a child"

We actually had the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons stand before us and assert something that is not correct. I regret that. He is the Deputy Leader of the House, but he does not understand the business of the House. Nevertheless, he will advise us to vote for something that I am arguing against. I hope that my party will vote against it convincingly, and I hope that the Liberal Democrats, on the basis of such an inadequate intervention from the Deputy Leader of the House, will also vote against the proposals.

I do not underestimate the importance of university fees and other such matters to the social framework of our country, but perhaps the most profound issue of this Parliament is war. I wish to point out what we will do by limiting freedom of speech through such motions. We were allowed only one day to debate whether we should go to war; the first time that Parliament had been given the authority to make the decision. We all know that representations were made to have more than one day of debate, but many hon. Members were unable to express their feelings about the defining issue of this Parliament. I commend my hon. Friends to vote against the motions.

4.32 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I shall follow in the spirit of my hon. Friends the Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), because underpinning this debate—which may seem limited in its scope—is one of the paradoxes that has struck me more and more about the House of Commons. It is that the way in which our parliamentary system works means that the House of Commons is expected and asked both to provide and sustain the Government of the day and, at the same time, to hold it to account. That worked reasonably satisfactorily for a long time; indeed, until very recently, when this Government came to power with no respect for the parliamentary process. The present Prime Minister, throughout his career, has shown very little interest in the parliamentary process and the Government have been ruthlessly determined to use their majority to get their way without let or hindrance.

Mr. Greg Knight: What does my right hon. Friend think of the fact that as we debate two Select Committee reports, there is not a single Labour member of either of those Committees in the Chamber?

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend reflects the point that I am trying to make; interest among Labour Members in Parliament and the parliamentary process has diminished almost to zero. Of course, I exempt the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who, as ever, has bravely tried to represent her entire party today, with her usual style and commitment.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills pointed out, a system that worked historically, informally and by tradition—all the things that are resented by the Government—has now almost completely broken down. What we have seen today is the culmination—although it may be only part of the way in a long process—of the diminution of the House of Commons and the rampancy and supremacy of the Executive. The apparently esoteric matters before us today form part of that process. The programming of Bills, deferred Divisions and the many other changes that have been made in the past seven years have reduced the opportunities for hon. Members to hold the Government to account through debate, delay, irritation, questioning and all the other means that have been used in the past. They have now almost all disappeared. Delay is now regarded as unacceptable. Debate is regarded as irrelevant and, as was reflected in one or two of the interventions today, the Government expect to legislate in uninterrupted fashion for four or five years.

That is not what I have always understood the parliamentary process to be. Although a Government, by definition, have a majority in the House and will almost invariably be able to legislate and have their way, I believe it is proper that the Government be delayed, held up and irritated and that Ministers be required to answer questions. That was part of the parliamentary process, but time and time again, in these procedural changes that are brought before us, we see that the Government regard debate as an irrelevance and votes as a formality—nothing should stand in the way of the Government and their Members.

Indeed, it is even worse than that: Members should not be inconvenienced in any way. That is what lay behind the change in hours and it is what lies behind the nonsense of the deferred Division. Time and time again, the word "convenience" has started to appear in the parliamentary lexicon. Members must be able to predict what will happen and when, so that nothing should inconvenience them and nothing should come in the way of their activities outside Parliament or outside the Chamber.

In my naivety, I cling to the view that the prime duty of a Member of Parliament is to be at Westminster in the House of Commons—in the Chamber and in Committees. Apparently, however, the new Labour view is that that is now a marginal activity, one that should be fitted, in a predictable way, into the many other activities that Members of Parliament apparently have, of which I have little understanding and for which I have very little sympathy. That is part of the rapid changes that have taken many of us by surprise over the past few years and are reflected in the motions to which we are asked to agree today.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman will know that I am one of those Members who voted for the new hours and immediately regretted it when they actually came into force.

I suspect that if we were to examine closely the Register of Members' Interests, there would be far more Conservative Members with outside interests than Labour Members. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that support for the new hours had nothing to do with outside interests, but more to do with an intention to bring the House, and the Chamber, into the 21st century—flawed though those moves may have turned out to be?

Mr. Forth: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman says, because he uses the phrase "into the 21st century", as if it explained everything and was in itself sufficient reason for making the changes that are proposed. I do not see what is significant about the 21st century. I am not sure what can have suddenly happened when we passed from 2000 to 2001 to give rise to such changes. This is the obsession with modernisation—a word that I have come to detest and which, as far as I am concerned, means nothing, certainly nothing positive, and has given rise to all the adverse changes to which we have been subject.

I resent and oppose the whole concept of programming. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills pointed out, in his typical way, programming, which is a benign enough sounding concept, has been the mechanism whereby the Government have taken the tightest possible grip on parliamentary process and procedure, and diminished the role of Standing Committees to such an extent that they are now merely a cipher. That is symbolic of the relationship that now exists between the Government—the Executive—and Parliament, the House of Commons.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am following my right hon. Friend's argument with great care, so I think that he will accept what I am about to say. When a Procedure Committee issues a report on House of Commons matters, it should be dealt with by a decision of the House; it should not be for the Government of the day to produce a response on a matter that is entirely the responsibility of the House and nothing to do with the Government.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, which goes to the very heart of the relationship that exists between the Government and the House of Commons and returns us to my introductory remarks and the paradox that we have to deal with: at one and the same time, the House of Commons provides and sustains the Government while trying to hold it to account. He is absolutely right. In an ideal world the Government should have no role in determining the procedures of the House of Commons. That is the ideal. Even I, extremist that I am in these matters, would have to concede that we have to find some sort of accommodation and understand the fact that the Government, with their elected majority, should probably have the major influence—I put it no more strongly than that—in the way in which the House works. However, that balance has now become so grotesquely out of kilter that we are put in the current position.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Would my right hon. Friend care to reflect, although he wants to stay in the 20th and 21st centuries, on the fact that the pass was sold in the 19th century, when during the difficulties that arose in relation to Home Rule, Lord Randolph Churchill and others fought against the changes that transferred the Speaker's rules effectively to the Executive. As a former Clerk of the House said in writing about that, that was when the House of Commons lost its control over business, and from that moment onwards, things have gone downhill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for taking us back to the 19th century. He would not have to tempt me too much to go further back than that—the further back perhaps the better—but the point is that debates on such issues occasionally give us the opportunity to try to put a stop to that process and perhaps even to reverse it.

Mr. Hogg: I share an awful lot of the views that are being expressed, but is not the basic truth that Members of Parliament have surrendered to the Executive powers that they ought to exercise and that, until we recover our self-respect, the Executive will dominate the House? Should my right hon. Friend not continue to make the point, when people talk about free votes, that all votes are free? It is because we have surrendered our liberty to the Whips that we need to talk about free votes. I believe that Members of Parliament should vote in accordance with their views, and I do not give two hoots about what the Whips say.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. and learned Friend displays the independence of mind of someone who is at a mature stage in his career, with perhaps not very much expectation of future advance.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Forth: I shall give way to the man who could decide that one way or the other.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will my right hon. Friend think back to the time when my right hon. and learned Friend was in the Whips Office?

Mr. Forth: I am a glad that I was not the one who had to remind my right hon. and learned Friend of that matter.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Both my right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend, who is making an excellent speech, reflect most magnificently the zeal of the convert.

Mr. Forth: Yes, indeed. I accept what my hon. Friend says. I have found myself having to say this more than once during my period in opposition.

Mr. Hogg: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Forth: Not while I am making my confession.

Of course, one's view varies from time to time, depending on how safe one's seat is, the stage of one's career and whether one is in government or opposition. That is self-evident, but it does not diminish the fact that those of us who have had the privilege of being elected for some little time now and have seen the House from the point of view of a Minister, a Government Back Bencher or an Opposition Back Bencher and so on can still hold views about the role of the House of Commons and of Members of Parliament that are perhaps better informed by that experience.

Mr. Hogg: Does my right hon. Friend accept the basic proposition that, whereas it is true that people like me bullied our Back-Bench colleagues when we were Whips, we would also make the confession that we did not think any more highly of them for allowing us to bully them?

Mr. Forth: I think that those are sufficient confessions for one day.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend is making important points, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), although he and I have not experienced the need for confession and contrition—or coercion for that matter. Does my right hon. Friend agree that Churchill got it right when, in acknowledging the necessity of political parties and a degree of discipline, he unequivocally said none the less that a Member's first duty was to his country, his second duty was to his constituents and only in the third instance was his duty to his party's policies and programme? If we stuck to that and undermined the overweening power of the Whips, would we not also increase the interest of the people of this country in what goes on here?

Mr. Forth rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, may I remind hon. Members that we are discussing the motion on programming?

Mr. Forth: I think that we are discussing all the motions before us. In agreeing with my hon. Friend, I was about to mention deferred Divisions, which is the subject of one of the motions—I hope that we will all vote against it.

Deferred Divisions are symbolic of Labour Members' desire to make life as easy as possible. As I recall, the rationale behind deferred Divisions was that it was rather inconvenient for Members of Parliament to have to be in the House at the end of a debate—be that 7 o'clock or 10 o'clock—and vote at that hour. We have moved causally and glibly from that simple proposition to a situation in which absurd ballot papers are made available on Wednesdays for use by hon. Members, not least the Prime Minister so that his abysmal voting record can be improved easily. We now have the phenomenon whereby a motion and the Division on it are neatly detached, often by several days.

One could argue that that situation is not necessarily significant in itself, and I would be the first to concede that on a day such as this, given the number of hon. Members in the Chamber, there may well be some detachment between the debate and the Division on the matter, even if it occurs at the end of the day. However, the symbolism of the deferred Division procedure remains important. It says yet again that we do such things for the convenience of the Government and Members with no regard for the parliamentary process or the relationship that is developing between the Executive and Parliament.

Mr. McLoughlin: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the growing demand from Labour Members—the Leader of the House confirmed this today—to deal with private Members' Bills on Tuesdays or Wednesdays after 7 o'clock? If that proposal is acceded to, does he agree that the explanations given for the deferred Division procedure show that the Government were concerned about only their convenience rather than that of the House?

Mr. Forth: The proposal raises interesting points—I shall not discuss them at length, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I shall touch on them if I may. If the proposal were followed through, we would go back to sitting late to deal with private Members' Bills, but we were told that such hours were unacceptable to hon. Members. I am happy to deal with private Members' Bills whenever they come before the House, but I would prefer to consider them on a Friday because we are able to see off most of them because fewer than 40 Members bother to attend on that day to support them. It remains to be seen whether sufficient Members would bother to attend later on a Tuesday or Wednesday, but the proposal gives the lie to the validity of the argument that was originally put before us.

May I say a brief word about the carry-over of Bills? The right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes)—I can actually say the name of his constituency properly—challenged us when he said that he had never heard a rationale set out for why carry-over was not self-evidently a good idea. Let me attempt to do that in the hope that he will read Hansard in the future. One of the main disciplines on a Government is Sessional discipline, which is the tradition that at the end of a Session, a Government have either legislated on a matter or they have not. That was a key discipline on my Government and it used to be one on this Government. The Government want to escape from that discipline so that they can legislate in any year without limit, but that is a bad thing. We have far too much legislation. The few controls that exist on the Government are diminishing, and Sessional discipline was one of the last remaining ones. For the Government to say, "Oh, by the way, if we run out of time at the end of a Session, let's just go on into the next one so that we can do what we want", without any restriction or discipline strikes me as extremely bad. That is the main reason why the carry-over of Bills is wrong.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My right hon. Friend has missed an important aspect of carry-over. Carry-over is not out of the question because some complicated non-controversial Bills require a great deal of consideration, but surely it becomes unacceptable when it does not have cross-party support.

Mr. Forth: I might reluctantly have to accept that in exceptional cases, when there is cross-party support, carry-over might be acceptable. I simply say, however, that any Government who are in proper control of their legislative programme should be able to introduce difficult and complex Bills early enough in the Session to deal with them properly during that Session. There may be exceptional circumstances in which an urgent matter might arise towards the end of a Session that requires legislation, but I expect that to be the exception.

Mr. Tom Harris: I am following the right hon. Gentleman's argument, but surely he accepts that without carry-over and programme motions, which he also opposes, it would be fairly easy for a minority of hon. Members to undermine the will of the House by preventing that will from being carried out. Surely if he believes that the House is a sovereign body, we cannot allow a small minority to talk out Bills that have the support of the House.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman illustrates yet again the wisdom of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills in that he has a limited sense of parliamentary history. I do not blame him for that. He arrived recently in the House, and nothing wrong with that. However, in the good old days of the 1980s, a Bill went into Committee with no time restriction or timetable. Opposition Members often delayed, irritated and caused nuisance. Government Back Benchers, such as myself, often sat until 1 and 2 am, which we regarded as part of our job. It was up to the Opposition at that stage, for many hours, many days and sometimes many months, to decide the pace and shape of the Committee. That was right.

At some stage, the Government would say, "Enough already!", and introduce a guillotine motion to allow only a certain amount of further debate. That was how we lived. To my mind, that was a proper balance between the power of the Government—we had a majority of 140 in 1983—and the right of Opposition Members to use the time as they saw fit. That is what has been destroyed.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): Towards the end of the 1980s, when Baroness Thatcher was Prime Minister, I was in the Government's Whips Office. The convention on progress in Committee was that we would take it as prima facie evidence that we were being obstructed if we had not got past clause 3 after 100 hours.

Mr. Forth: I share my hon. Friend's memory of that. Colleagues who were here in the 1980s will recall many big Bill Committees running for 150 and 200 hours before they were guillotined.

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. Friend describes the late-night sittings and he is entirely right. Does he agree that the fact that Governments were subjected to late nights constrained their readiness to introduce long and difficult Bills? They were more constrained and the volume of legislation was less partly as a result of the late nights.

Mr. Forth: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend is right. All those things contribute to restraining and limiting what the Government do. Nearly all of them have gone, which explains the prolix nature of this Government's legislative approach.

Mr. Shepherd: When a Government wanted to truncate debate in Committee or on the Floor of the House they had to move a guillotine motion, which could be debated for three hours. So they had to justify the reasoning behind the action because, as our Library notes used to note, the guillotine is the most draconian measure in parliamentary debate.

Mr. Forth: We do not do debates any more in the House of Commons. The debates that we routinely held on the Floor of the House on statutory instruments, guillotines and so on have all disappeared, some of them completely. Time and time again, motions on the Order Paper are followed by the words "without debate", which symbolises the Government's belief that debate, discourse and exchange of views are an irrelevance. The Government believe that there is no need to hold debates, because they have a large majority and their Members have better things to do. They do not want to be distracted by such things.

Finally, on the issue of strangers, I agree with what has been said about political correctness. No one has told me that they found the use of the term "strangers" offensive, nor that they were deterred from coming to the Palace of Westminster because they are referred to in that way. This is another piece of nonsense. Earlier the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) spoke about Chairs, and the proposal to remove references to strangers distracts us from the real business before us. As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said, only the press are interested in whether or not members of the public should be called strangers. Why do we not call them guests or stakeholders? Surely, we could find a more welcoming term than "the public". If we are going to go down that route, we should be a lot more cuddly and welcoming. Let us hold back, and keep "strangers" until we find something really fuzzy to which people can relate and which, if they were deterred before, will bring them rushing to the Chamber.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I shall be brief, as I am conscious that I have not heard the full debate, for which I apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and other contributors.

I shall address the points about Report stage made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), which were strongly reinforced by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), who explicitly suggested that that stage should be exempt from programming. I entirely agree with my hon. Friends, and shall reinforce their argument. In truth, if Members are not selected to serve on Committee they do not have an opportunity fully to address the detail of a Bill unless they participate on Report. Before the Whips remind me, I acknowledge that I have not been forward in volunteering to serve on Committee, but when I have done so I have articulated the Hogg rules—I vote in accordance with my opinion; I move amendments as I think fit; and I conduct myself as a free Member.

Sir Patrick Cormack: That is why my right hon. and learned Friend is never chosen to serve on Committee.

Mr. Hogg: That is true, but it does not disqualify me as a matter of definition from having views on a Bill. I have views on almost every Bill that affects the constitution, the law, foreign affairs and many other things, but they are not always the same as my party's views. I am clearly entitled to express those views, and it is wrong to deny me that opportunity. The Report stage is the one opportunity—

Sir Nicholas Winterton: It is the only one.

Mr. Hogg: It is the only opportunity, my hon. Friend rightly reminds me, for right hon. and hon. Members who did not serve on Committee to address the detail of the Bill.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): At what point in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's parliamentary career did the Hogg rules come into force?

Mr. Hogg: I shall be candid. When I first came to the House, I wanted to be a Minister and, I am glad to say, I held ministerial office for 13 years, which I enjoyed hugely. Naturally, in pursuit of that ambition I occasionally swallowed my opinions and bullied people. No doubt, I did things that I later regretted, but in favour of myself I would say that when I did so I knew that I was wrong. Now, I am suitably contrite and I can bring to the House the experience of someone who has bullied right hon. and hon. Members in my capacity as a Whip. If I am asked whether I think that is an honourable activity, the answer is no. But if I am asked whether I think it is honourable to allow oneself to be bullied, the answer is even less so. Right hon. and hon. Members must recover their self-respect. We are in this place to assert the rights of Parliament, to hold the Executive to account and to face down our own party. Until we do that, this place will be held in contempt, and rightly so.

The Report stage is a small part of that process. Bills such as the Civil Contingencies Bill, which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills and I were the only Opposition Members to oppose—

Mr. Cash: No, I did too.

Mr. Hogg: I apologise. My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) also opposed the Bill. We three should have ample opportunity to point out the evils associated with that legislation and many other pieces of legislation. My colleague has been through the evidence and pointed out the effect of the knives, both in Committee and much more seriously on Report. Very important clauses and schedules were allowed to pass through the House without discussion.

That is offensive for a number of reasons. First, it puts too great a burden on the other place. Secondly, it enables Government to be slipshod about the drafting of legislation. It enables them to present legislation late because they know it will not be discussed. Much worse, it undermines the bargain that underpins a democratic society, because the electorate gives away its freedoms and gives us the right to impose penalties and rules on the premise that we will give them serious consideration and debate them properly. If we deny ourselves the ability to do that, we are cutting away the basis on which the public surrenders its own rights. I therefore hope that we will accede to the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield and accepted by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills on the question of the Report stage and exempt the Report stage from the programming procedures currently under discussion.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): It is a privilege to take part in the debate. I have heard some exceptional speeches, not least from my hon. Friend—it should be my right hon. Friend—the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

We are discussing fundamental issues. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham said, we are acting on trust from the electorate and that trust is cut away from under our feet by the machinations of those who run Government business and our own party's business. I would go further and say, as I have said on other occasions, that in the context of the programming arrangements, the Whip system makes the Whips appear as though they had exclusive knowledge and competence to decide what is in the national interest, whereas we know that neither the Whips nor political parties or their leaders have that right or that prerogative—far from it.

I could give several examples, including the corn laws, home rule, tariff reform, appeasement, the Thatcher trade union reforms and, as we heard, Maastricht, as well as Amsterdam and Nice. It is obvious that the minority view prevailed, despite the fact that there were those who took a strong line against the Government of the day or their own party. The Report stage is fundamental to the process: it allows Back Benchers a unique opportunity and should clearly be excluded from programming.

I differ slightly from my hon. Friends on one point, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) raised. Getting to clause 3 in a Bill is as much the Opposition's fault as the Government's. Sometimes an unnecessary number of amendments are tabled—a gross self-indulgence that has been pursued on a number of occasions—in the belief that infinite time is available in which to consider the Bill. However, something happens sooner or later. Rather than adhering exclusively to the principle that time is the Opposition's best weapon, I have always believed that argument would be better employed if the use of amendments were more temperate.

On occasions, I have spent four out of six months in Committee on clause 1, which is ludicrous. In those cases, the argument went on and on about a particular clause because it encapsulated much of what followed, but later matters were addressed with a certain laziness and incompetence. A more moderate, measured and selective approach to amendments would perhaps lead to a situation in which Governments would not get so frustrated and impose the guillotine over and over again. The current position is, to say the least, an abuse of this House and of procedure.

Mr. John Taylor: I am following my hon. Friend's excellent arguments closely. Does he agree that the situation has turned—it is still totally unsatisfactory—and that the Government are by far and away the most prolix author of amendments?

Mr. Cash: That point is valid, and I say that having tabled many amendments to some Bills, such as those that introduced the Maastricht, Nice and Amsterdam treaties. I fear that my hon. Friend is right.

I warn the Government that after Friday, when the Prime Minister will sign up to the European constitution, we will move on to the next stage of that question. When I was shadow Attorney-General and during the following year, I spent many hours dealing with the question of primacy in direct argument with the Foreign Secretary and, indeed, the Prime Minister. The issue of primacy has now been conceded, in that it is now accepted that this Parliament is sovereign and can legislate accordingly, irrespective of the European Communities Act 1972, if it so wishes.

If it were decided that the Bill introducing the European constitutional treaty could be programmed, the very existence of this House as a proper deliberative assembly on the legislation that would subsequently pour out of Europe, including laws, future treaties and the European Court of Justice's rulings, would effectively be frustrated. The Leader of the House and I have discussed those matters, and he knows that to programme a Bill introducing the European constitutional treaty would be the gravest constitutional outrage. God help this country and God help this House if such a Bill is programmed. I look to the Deputy Leader of the House to assure the House that such a Bill will not be subject to a programme motion under any circumstances.

5.9 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): This has been an extremely good debate. I say at the outset that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I are very conscious of the strongly held views of right hon. and hon. Members and of the huge experience displayed in the debate by Members on both sides of the House. If one tots up the number of years of service of those who spoke, it amounts to some 306 years of parliamentary experience. Having been a Member of this House for seven years, I naturally respect and defer to that experience.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) for misunderstanding his remarks when I intervened on him. I thought that he was talking about Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation. I regret that mistake and assure him that I will try to concentrate more keenly in future.

I sincerely thank the Chairmen and members of the Procedure Committee and the Modernisation Committee for their work. Their reports are excellent.

I assure the House that a great amount of attention, detail and concentrated effort has been put into our response.

I give the further reassurance that we are served by among the best, if not the best, team of civil servants who serve this House, and their point of view is taken very much into consideration. I hope that no right hon. or hon. Member on either side of the House feels that we have not given this matter the consideration that it deserves.

Sir Patrick Cormack: That points to the Government's misunderstanding of Parliament. The Clerks of this House are not civil servants.

Mr. Woolas: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to point-score. I was referring to the civil servants in the Cabinet Office who advise us; of course the Clerks are not civil servants in the sense of working for the Government.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I take the independence of this House extremely seriously. It is in the nature of our parliamentary system that the legislature and the Executive intersect through the Front Benches of the House. My right hon. Friend has not only duties to the Government but duties to the House. Unless we were to make a radical change to the way in which our Parliament and Government interrelate—which I am sure that the traditionalists who have spoken would not support—there will always be a tension between the Government, of whatever party, and the rights of the House.

There will inevitably be disagreements in seeking to get that balance right. However, one of the great strengths of these Houses of Parliament and this House of Commons is that disagreements over procedure are very small compared with the huge areas where there is agreement. That is reflected in the Government's response to the Committees' reports. Nevertheless, debates in the Chamber and such reporting as there is in the press always concentrate on the disagreements.

Many hon. Members expressed their opposition to programming, and I suspect that motion 2 will generate the most disagreement. I say from the outset that our attempts to introduce programming and the way in which it operates do not reflect, and should not be portrayed as, a heavy-handed Executive trying to force their will on to a reluctant House of Commons. I could refer to the statistics, but I fear that when they are quoted hon. Members' minds are often closed. It is not the case that the number of scrutinised clauses in Bills has decreased since the introduction of programming. The opposite is true. Filibustering prevented debate on many clauses because it meant that we did not necessarily focus on controversial clauses but on earlier provisions, often to delay if not to stop debate on the controversial issues that the majority of hon. Members wanted to reach. Programming has not therefore resulted in fewer clauses being scrutinised.

Mr. Cash: I have a certain sympathy for the view that the Deputy Leader of the House has expressed. There is a world of difference between reasonable amendments, which are presented in a measured and temperate fashion and cover a whole Bill—what appears at the end of a Bill can be as important as what appears at the beginning—and others. However, does he accept that what constitutes a filibuster is a matter for the Chair, whether in Standing Committee or on the Floor of the House? With great respect to the Chair, perhaps a little more stringency could be applied to those who are clearly engaged in a filibuster, which the Chair would understand from reading "Erskine May". There is a solution to the problem and the suggestion of the Deputy Leader of the House is somewhat disingenuous—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a lengthy intervention. I call Mr. Woolas.

Mr. Woolas: Let me make a general and a specific response. At the core of the debate lies a disagreement about the nature of scrutiny and of opposition. Many hon. Members—I imagine the majority, but we shall find out later—contend that strength of argument and evidence that can be brought before Parliament should form the basis of opposition. Others argue that time and its use are a weapon of opposition and that any attempt by the Executive to control that means a diminution of the Opposition's power. The Government firmly support the first argument.

However, it is not true that we have restricted time for debate on major and even minor legislation to a greater extent than happened before 1997. There has been selective citation of the use of guillotines when many more were used before 1997 for reasons that have been given. If we compare the number of guillotines on Bills, many more were used before the Labour Government came to power. Confusion of internal knives with guillotines clouds the debate.

Mr. Shepherd: If the Deputy Leader of the House reads the Deputy Speaker's submission, he will realise that the definitions of "programme motion" and "guillotine" are almost indistinguishable—earlier, I mentioned the Standing Order point about guillotines—but he elides the two. Almost every Bill under this Government is guillotined.

Mr. Woolas: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which he made in his speech. Of course, I read the memorandum from the Chairman of Ways and Means and we debated the point in the previous debate on the subject. The point that I am striving to make is the same as the hon. Gentleman's in his minority report to the Procedure Committee. According to his evidence, in the period from 1946 to February 1997, 67 Bills were guillotined, and from 3 June 1997 to 21 October 2003, 94 Bills were guillotined. However, in the previous debate on the subject, the comparison of internal knives in a programme motion with a guillotine that cut off the end date of a Standing Committee showed that the figures are comparing apples with pears.

My second point—

Mr. Shepherd: Will the Deputy Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Woolas: If the hon. Gentleman could hear me out—he may not respect my experience in the House, but I hope that he respects my right to put the argument to him.

If we examine the evidence in the fourth report from the Procedure Committee, and the evidence given by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), we find that the cat is out of the bag. On page 44, he was asked about filibustering, and said:

> "I concede that in the old days a lot of time was wasted by filibustering—and, frankly, low-grade filibustering".

In his evidence on internal knives—or guillotines, if we want to use the phraseology that he used before—he said:

> "The end date is crucial. If I can give away another trade secret, I actually think that knives are helpful to the filibusterers, if there ever were any such people and if they managed to escape the eagle eye of the Chair of the Committee."

In other words, for every knife that the usual channels put in place, there is an opportunity for filibustering. How can programming, which is simply sensible timetabling—which every other institution in this country has, including the courts of law, which have their own procedures on timetabling business—

Mr. Forth rose—

Mr. Woolas: The right hon. Gentleman rises in indignation that I, a Member with only seven years' experience, should have a view on whether I should be able to go home before midnight or stay here until 4 am. I am quite prepared to stay here until 4 am. I did so on the National Minimum Wage Bill Committee, and it was the best thing I have ever done in Parliament.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Deputy Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Woolas: If I may, I will just finish my point.

What I see as the sensible timetabling of programming, some right hon. and hon. Members see as a curtailment of their rights. The evidence of that, however, does not stand up to scrutiny. The best bit of evidence is this: the Front Benches on both sides of the House are committed to making programming work better for all concerned, whether Back or Front Benchers. The strong, principled opposition to programming, which some right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House hold dear, is understandable, but making programming work is what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is doing. That is for the benefit of the House. [Interruption.] I should give way to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, as I quoted him at some length.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Deputy Leader of the House for quoting me, but I think that he is deliberately missing the point, which is perhaps obscured by the quotation. In previous times, the Opposition were largely in control of events until the Government decided that enough was enough. Whether the Opposition used that control wisely was up to them. Now the Government are in control of events and of the timetable from the start. That is the crucial change that has taken place, which he and his colleagues seem to think is perfectly natural, and which I find obnoxious.

Mr. Woolas: What is amazing about the arguments of the conservatives with a small "c" is that they hark back to a golden age when Parliament really was the power in the land—but it was not. In the second Churchill premiership, the then Prime Minister was also the Leader of the House. As Prime Minister and Leader of the House, he would come to the Chamber and tell both Front Benches exactly what they were going to do and when they were going to do it; indeed, he used to hold the Adjournment debate, too. Did they have Programming Sub-Committees in those days? To coin a phrase, did they heck—they used to sort it out in smoke-filled rooms. If that is the golden age to which right hon. and hon. Members refer, we can go back to that—

Mr. Cash: Will the Deputy Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Woolas: I must move on.

This Government have given more transparency to how we timetable business in the House than any previous Government, to such an extent that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House more commonly has arguments with his own Whips Office than with the traditionalists among the Opposition. If only right hon. and hon. Gentlemen would accept that point, we would be able to move forward.

Sir Robert Smith: I wonder whether, having listened to the debate, the Deputy Leader of the House is any more disposed to accept amendments from the Procedure Committee. Does he recognise that in rejecting them he is likely to reduce support for the final motion?

Mr. Woolas: The answer to that question is obvious. The reasons for our choosing to accept many of the Committee's recommendations, but to object to a small number of them, have been set out by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. There is honest disagreement on them.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Woolas: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman because he chairs the Procedure Committee, but I must then respond to what has been said.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech with some concern. We are debating the Government's motions and the Procedure Committee's amendments to them. While the Leader of the House spent some time in seeking to respond to the amendments, the Deputy Leader of the House is not dealing with them at all. May I remind him that the Procedure Committee has not objected to the Government's deciding on an out date from Standing Committee for a Bill? What we are saying is that the total handling of programming should be genuinely more democratic, and result from in-depth consultation and a knowledge of what the House as a whole thinks of a Bill on Second Reading. If he would attend to that, he would probably be more sympathetic to amendments that I think make programming much more acceptable.

Mr. Woolas: I was coming to those points. I want to respond to the contributions that have been made, but when I reach that stage, the hon. Gentleman may wish to intervene again.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) asked for a commitment that programming would not be used on the Constitution for Europe (Referendum) Bill. I cannot give him that commitment. The arguments for sensible programming and sensible timetabling will apply equally to that Bill when we reach it, but that has not been decided yet.

We heard some fascinating confessions from the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). He confessed that he had swallowed his opinion on many occasions, and that he had been a bully; but I think his main point was that he had lost respect for those whom he was bullying. I felt that he went rather over the top when he said that the arguments before the House this afternoon were undermining democratic society.

I want to say a little in support of the Whips Office. It is, I think, the experience of Members on both sides of the House that without the Whips Office—without the usual channels, and the ability to have a private conversation about the business of the House—we would never get anything done. Of course the rights of minorities and minority points of view must be protected in all parts of the House, but whatever system of programming—or absence of programming—we had, we would have to reach a decision eventually. As everyone knows, without the Whips Offices nothing would get done and nothing would be decided.

I can provide the reassurance for which many hon. Members have asked that this is genuinely a free vote. Hansard will record tomorrow that not all members of the Government Whips Office will support all the Government's recommendations. I assure the House that there are debates even there. Members of the Whips Offices will of course take part in the telling, and will advise Members on the procedures; but there is no pressure from Government on Labour Back Benchers to vote in one way or the other. The strength of our arguments is our weapon, as always. I reject the description of the Whips Offices as the "dark forces".

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst talked of the relationship between the House and the Executive. He said that he had experience of it from different perspectives—as a Front Bencher, a Minister and a Back Bencher. I respect that experience, but he must surely agree that—as I said earlier, and as my right hon. Friend said—there are tensions in the intersection between the Executive and the legislature. There are bound to be disagreements. Is that not the nature of our Parliament? In other countries, the Executive and the legislature are separate. If that were the position here, elected Members of Parliament would have less ability to scrutinise legislation. If that is the road that the right hon. Gentleman wants to go down, he should be honest about that.

Hon. Members asked about early-day motions. The idea of tagging early-day motions merits further consideration. The difficulty we have with automatic entitlement to Westminster Hall debates is that it would diminish the rights of individual Members and minorities. At present, we all have an equal chance of securing a Westminster Hall debate, but if the number of supporters was the criterion for allocation, I suspect that early-day motions would quickly become a tool of the Whips Office—the very dark forces that the hon. Members advancing the idea are keen to avoid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made a powerful speech in which she stood up for the rights of Back Benchers. I hope that she will give credence to this argument. The statistics and evidence that we have presented not just in the debate but to the Procedure Committee show categorically that more time for scrutiny of clauses has been achieved with sensible timetabling. I, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and the Government agree that, in the early stages especially—and still today in some cases—programming did not work. It was detrimental in certain instances. Standing Committees that I was involved in had programming that did not work, but month after month, year after year, programming has bedded in. It has become broadly accepted across the House—of course, there are exceptions to this view—that it is sensible, particularly for outside bodies that wish to come to scrutinise what is going on here.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) pointed out that the Procedure Committee's report was unanimous. We accept that, of course. The Committee has a majority of Labour Members. He is right about that—that is one reason why we have listened and accepted many of the recommendations—but it still comes back to an honest disagreement between MPs and the business managers, who have a responsibility to get legislation through, properly scrutinised, as the shadow Leader of the House said. That is why we accepted many of the recommendations—there is all-party agreement.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall specifically asked whether Back Benchers should be able to influence programme motions. That goes to the heart of the matter. This answers some of the points that the distinguished Chairman of the Committee has raised. There is an assumption behind his arguments and behind the amendments that, if the role of the Whips and the usual channels were taken away, we could free Back Benchers from the responsibilities and duties of timetabling legislation. Frankly, that view is naive. If some of these changes were implemented, they would quickly be replaced by new usual channels functions, which would compromise Back Benchers' independence. We cannot get away from the fact that the House is elected on party lines, with an official Opposition and the Government in the majority.

We talked about deferred Divisions. Those who support deferred Divisions would point out that they at least give Members who could not attend the debate the opportunity to read the proceedings in Hansard. It is preferable for a Member to attend the debate in the Chamber, but at least a deferred Division gives that opportunity—it is for the convenience of Members. That is right: it would surely be wrong to make our procedures deliberately for the inconvenience of Members. That is why deferred Divisions—an experiment that many Members opposed very strongly when it was first suggested—have become our customary practice. I bet that in 25 years' time, when a young Deputy Leader of the House tries to change that practice, traditionalists will argue that it should be kept because it is a custom of this House. I hope that I am here to listen to that debate.

Carry-over has proved a success, as has pre-legislative scrutiny, which has been accepted in all parts of the House as a better way to scrutinise Bills. We intend to continue with both. The question has been asked—

Mr. Woolas: I think that I can predict what the hon. Gentleman is going to say. He is seeking an assurance that carry-over will take place only where there is unanimity among the parties. In practice, that is the case in any event—particularly when one bears in mind the other place—but I suspect that the implementation of the guarantee that he seeks would disappoint him. Of course, the assumption is that consideration would be given only to the Bill proposed for carry-over; but in reality, it would be horse-traded with other Bills. In that regard, we should compare disabilities and hunting legislation. In reality, the two would not be separated, as those in the Whips Office know.

Mr. Tyler: In fact, I was going to ask for a rather more narrow assurance. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the House decided on 29 October 2002 on a package of reforms that included carry-over, and that it decided then, on the basis of the Select Committee's recommendation, that after the Queen's Speech there should be a mechanism by which such discussions should take place. Is he giving an explicit assurance that there will be such a discussion on the legislative programme—on carry-over—after the Queen's Speech in a few weeks' time?

Mr. Woolas; I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks, but I should point out that the Chairmen of the Select Committees are of course involved in discussions on the legislative programme, and in particular on pre-legislative scrutiny. The usual channels are also involved in such discussions, as he knows. Again, if the assurance that he seeks were given, in practice the process would not work, because not all circumstances can be foreseen. The Queen's Speech represents the legislative programme, and the question of its timetabling throughout the year, and of which Bills should be subject to carry-over, has to be decided in the light of real-world events. I hope that he accepts that there is a difference of opinion in that regard.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Woolas: Yes, but I must soon draw my remarks to a close, as I sense that the House is impatient. .

Sir Nicholas Winterton: This issue is critical constitutionally. The Deputy Leader of the House is asking for permission and sanction to change Standing Orders, and he wants to include in them automatic carry-over. The Opposition believe that there should be carry-over, but only with cross-party support. Will he not give that one undertaking, which is constitutionally critical? He said that this issue is not important, and that such support would probably be sought. I am not a lawyer, but I believe that what is in black and white is important, so I want the phrase "with cross-party support in respect of carry-over" included in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Woolas: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I respect his opinion greatly, as I hope he knows. The point that I am seeking to make is that in practice, the Government do seek, and get, all-party agreement on which Bills will be carried over, and in practice we do so in both Houses. If, however, that were enshrined in Standing Orders, the difficulty is not that the Opposition and minority parties would be given a veto over the Bill proposed for carry-over—normally, it is non-controversial, and I imagine that that will always be so—but that that Bill would form part of the horse-trading with other Bills before the House, in which case the objective of consensus would, in my view, break down. I do not say that in the light of any particular Bill currently before the House and I say it irrespective of the colour of the Government in power. I simply believe that it would be a fact of political life.

I should like to draw my remarks to a close—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—having sensed the impatience of the House on this matter. The key question is whether we want sensible timetabling of Bills. Do we want to be able to conduct our business in a way that allows scrutiny and also allows the outside world to be aware of the timetabling of our business? Opposition Front Benchers have not given a commitment fully to implement the Procedure Committee reports, as they said that they would do so only in spirit, and neither have they given a commitment to withdraw programming in the unlikely event that they form the next Government. On that basis, I ask the House to support the Government recommendations made in response to the Procedure Committee and to reject the amendments.

Amendment proposed: (a) in line 4, after '1169)', insert 'approves the recommendation in paragraph 52 of the Report relating to a statement of clauses and schedules not debated in standing committee'.—[Sir Nicholas Winterton.]

It being after Six o'clock, MR DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put the remaining Questions to be decided at that hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): As amendment (b) has been lost, amendment (c) automatically falls.

Amendment proposed: (d), in line 21, at end insert—

'(5A) In Order D (Programme orders: conclusion of proceedings in standing committee or in committee of the whole House), after paragraph (1), insert—

"(1A) The chairman of a standing committee shall defer the putting of any question in accordance with a programme order by a period equal to that for which that sitting of the committee has been suspended owing to divisions in the House or in a committee of the whole House, and the chairman may also defer the putting of any such question by a period not exceeding a quarter of an hour if he considers it to be for the general convenience of the committee.

Provided that if the time at which a question falls to be put is thereby deferred beyond the hour specified in the proviso to paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees), the question shall be put instead at the corresponding time after the commencement of the next sitting of the committee.".'.—[Sir Nicholas Winterton.]

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the light of the result of the final Division, what steps will be taken to change the names in some of our ancient customs? For example, will instructions be issued tomorrow for police officers to shout, "Hats off, Stakeholders!"? Will the Public Gallery be renamed the Stakeholders or Friends Gallery tomorrow? Can you give us any guidance on when those important changes will come into effect?

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not true that we do not have to change any of those things?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand that those matters will be looked at very carefully by Mr. Speaker, in consultation with the other authorities of the House.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Given your ruling, may I ask whether the House of Commons Commission has a budget to allow for the changes that will take place to the notice boards and other structures of this House to meet the unfortunate decision taken tonight?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am always worried when people say that I have given a ruling. I did not think that I had given a ruling. I thought that I had just explained the situation to the House. As for the budget for such matters, I am sure that that issue may also be left safely in the hands of Mr. Speaker and his advisers.

Jaguar

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

7.12 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): I am grateful to have the opportunity to discuss the issue of Jaguar. Looking around me, I have to say that I did not realise that I was so popular. There are often only two or three people present for Adjournment debates. My colleagues from the west midlands—in particular, the other two Members from Coventry—and I appreciate the fact that our right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry took the time to meet representatives of Jaguar workers. That was a big thing, and it reflected the degree of concern on the Government's part to try to sort out the problem that we have with Jaguar.

I also appreciate the fact that colleagues from the west midlands are in their places tonight. They have been staunch in their support for what the three Coventry Members have tried to do throughout and they have been ready to do anything that we have asked them to do. Some of my colleagues will be interested to learn that the Trade and Industry Committee has agreed to take evidence, on 2 and 17 November provisionally, from both sides. The shop stewards and the work force at Jaguar have wanted that for a long time, certainly since this problem arose. That announcement is a positive step.

I have some questions for my right hon. Friend the Minister, which I shall ask now, in case I lose track of what I have said later in the debate. What contacts have been made between the trade unions and Jaguar by her Department to start discussions or negotiations? If that has happened, what will the terms of reference be and at what level will the negotiations take place? We have the convenor from Peugeot at Ryton in the Public Gallery this evening. Workers at Ryton are concerned that the company has not yet confirmed whether it will take up the European grant. If it does so, it will give us a good indication that it is committed to staying in Coventry; if it delays, there is a question over that, but if it says no, it may be moving out. I hope that the Minister will be able to respond to those serious questions.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on obtaining this debate, which is extremely important not only for Coventry but for the surrounding west midlands area. Employment prospects in my constituency are heavily dependent on Jaguar. I remind my hon. Friend, however, that we have been here before: we can remember when the engine plant went to Bridgend, when the paint plant and the body plant went to Castle Bromwich and when one platform was sent to Speke. But at least all those places were in the United Kingdom. If Jaguar moves its production and its platforms out of the UK, there will no longer be a Jaguar car.

Mr. Cunningham: That is why the debate is about Jaguar and west midlands manufacturing. I know that many of my west midlands colleagues are concerned about Ford's future intentions. I do not want to start any hares running, but it is right to be concerned about the future, and I am positive that the trade union side will raise such issues with Jaguar if, as we hope, a meeting takes place.

I pay special tribute to my two colleagues from Coventry, who have been putting in a tremendous effort, although I was fortunate enough to secure the debate. The House will understand that one of them, the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth), as the Deputy Chief Whip cannot speak in the debate—he is often on the receiving end from people outside who do not understand the procedures of the House.

Over the last 20 years, in Coventry, we have seen the closure of some famous plants. I am sure that my west midlands colleagues will remember the Standard Motor Company. They will also remember that Rolls-Royce closed the Parkside plant where a considerable number of people were employed. Within the last two years, we have seen the closure of Massey Ferguson in Coventry. As I said, there is now concern about the intentions of Peugeot.

The situation is serious, and we must be concerned about these big issues. Recently, Ford announced the closure of the Browns Lane production plant in Coventry, giving us the sop, which we do not believe, that its headquarters and its wood veneering section would remain on the site. However, if the company is prepared to tear up a signed agreement, how can we believe what it says about the future of that site and of Whitley? When Ford moves from the Browns Lane site, we shall lose 1,300 jobs, no matter how the company dresses it up. To put it another way, there could be 1,300 new jobs that will not be created.

In 1998, a written agreement was made between the trade unions and the company, which stated that for increases in productivity, efficiency and quality the company would guarantee future products and investments—note those words. Only last February, in a letter signed by senior executives at Coventry, the company congratulated the work force on delivering their part of the agreement and their promises. There were vast improvements in productivity and quality; indeed, the work force were held up to the rest of Ford, especially Land Rover at Solihull, as an example of what could be achieved. I am sure that example was used throughout the Ford combine, yet by September, although the workers had clearly delivered their part of the bargain, the company's response was to close the plant. After congratulating the labour force and telling the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that things were okay in February, the management were prepared to tear up an agreement by September. They blatantly told my colleagues and I that, yes, the agreement had come to an end and they were tearing it up because they wanted to close that plant.

I have been in the trade union movement a long time and I know one thing: with relationships between the labour force and the company, the most important thing is that people keep the word that they have given across the table. If people break their word, it is one of the biggest crimes that can be committed in industrial relations because no one will ever trust their word again. Yet Ford wonders why my colleagues, who are sitting beside me, and I have grave doubts about any guarantees that it has given for the future of the Whitley site.

This is the thin edge of the wedge in relation to the future of Ford. That is why we need to consider something like the legislation in Europe so that nothing can happen until the workers are fully informed and agreement is reached. It is about time that we looked at that. Only two or three years ago, the same thing happened when BMW told its labour force in Germany that it would close Rover in the west midlands, yet the labour force in the west midlands were told nothing about it. We can remember the demonstrations that were held throughout the west midlands and the Select Committee on Trade and Industry taking evidence. An asset stripper was lined up to take over the company, but that was stopped by the sheer pressure of public opinion and Members, with the support of the Select Committee. The then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers)—did a magnificent job. No one who knows anything about it would quarrel with the way in which he handled that situation.

Ford has broken an agreement—that cannot be said too often—and it is important that it comes clean, puts its proposals on the table and offers them up to scrutiny, while being prepared to talk to the trade unions about alternative proposals. If the company thinks that its proposals are right, it should be prepared to have them tested and to say why it cannot accept the proposals that the trade union makes on behalf of the work force. Unless the company is prepared to do that, no one will take anything that it says very seriously. That must be said.

My time is up now because I promised my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) that he could have 10 minutes, but I hope that the Minister will respond to the questions that I asked initially. They are serious questions, and we need some serious answers.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) in thanking Mr. Speaker for granting the debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing it. It is a pleasure to have such a good turnout on the Labour Benches and, to some extent, even on the Conservative Benches. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about the Liberals?"] We do not expect anything from that lot. When there is a serious matter, they are usually not to be found. From our point of view, this is a serious matter and it shows that, in proposing the closure, Ford has touched a raw nerve in the House and throughout the country. Browns Lane is the historic, original centre for Jaguar. Moreover, since Ford took over, it is a highly productive, highly efficient, high-quality assembly plant.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the closure will have an effect on many factories in the wider area, certainly in my constituency and throughout the black country, which undertake contracting and subcontracting work? We view what has been happening in Coventry with grave concern.

Mr. Robinson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. It is usually calculated that, for every job in manufacturing lost directly, another two can be counted in the supply chain and more widely in the surrounding industries. The concerns go even wider than jobs lost, and I shall come to that in a moment.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South said, this comes down to the credibility of a major global company that operates in this country and throughout the world. But, to be fair to Ford, I want to pay two personal tributes. In the 15 years in which Ford has owned Jaguar, it has done many good things. We should put on record that when Bill Hayden moved to Jaguar, he made an inestimable contribution towards putting right what had been wrong with it for many years. He got the quality right and broke the back of the problem. Nick Scheele took over from him and was a fine chief executive. In those 15 years, Ford invested heavily in, and did a lot of good for, Jaguar. However, the results thus far have not lived up to its expectations, which is why we believe that the erroneous, sudden and inexplicable decision to go back on its previous policy has been taken.

The opening of Jaguar at Castle Bromwich happened under Ford and led to hundreds of millions of pounds of investment, and the huge investment in Halewood was due to Ford. However, it was clearly understood when those decisions were made that neither would occur at the cost of not investing in Browns Lane. Such investment could easily have been made at Browns Lane.

The situation led to the signing of a comprehensive agreement in 1998 between the trade unions—Keith White, who signed the agreement, is still the convenor at Browns Lane for the unions—and representatives of the Ford Motor Company at the highest level. Jacques Nasser, the then chief executive officer, and Nick Scheele, the chairman and chief executive of Jaguar, signed the agreement. The agreement was not circumscribed, or made conditional on circumstances or time. It was a commitment made by Ford that if the unions did what was expected of them and met targets for high productivity and quality standards, there would be no question but that the Jaguar large saloon and replacement models would go to Browns Lane, as would the sports car. The present management subsequently confirmed that clear-cut written agreement.

I know that the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce is a lawyer, as is the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor)—they are both in the Chamber. Such people might have better knowledge of the matter than me. However, it seems to me that although the written agreement was not legally binding—we all know that the unions have never wanted to enter into such agreements for other reasons—a question of estoppel could arise due to the fact that on the basis of the representations made by the company, the unions undertook to accept onerous conditions in their working practices. I do not know whether estoppel could apply in that situation, but given the serious nature of the matter, that could and should be considered because it might mean that the company would take the agreement more seriously than it seems to want to at present.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South was right to say that the debate is about not only Jaguar, but manufacturing, although Jaguar and Browns Lane are the main focus of my remarks. There are other large concerns in the west midlands, especially regarding Peugeot. I do not expect a response to this point today, but it is extraordinarily unclear why the application for regional selective assistance has not been agreed at the European level. We are beginning to doubt whether Peugeot is serious about pursuing that.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that decisions made regarding Jaguar Racing in my constituency and Cosworth have a knock-on effect on the general motor industry? Innovations that come from motor sport are critical.

Mr. Robinson: I take my hon. Friend's point. The situation at Cosworth should be highlighted, so I hope that he will try to secure a similar debate to raise the matter. We would wish him well and support him in that.

I said that the 1998 agreement had been subsequently confirmed. On Tuesday 3 February, the present chairman and chief executive of Jaguar, Joe Greenwell—he is a fine and long-standing Jaguar employee—had lunch with my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth). He told my hon. Friend that it had been agreed at the head office in Detroit that Browns Lane was safe. He told him that the 1998 agreement had been confirmed and that the successor model to the large saloon and the sports car would continue to be produced at Browns Lane. Joe Greenwell took my hon. Friend out to lunch here in the Commons—

Mr. Bob Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East) (Lab): I paid for it.

Mr. Robinson: So my hon. Friend made his own modest contribution, which no doubt found its way into his modest declaration of expenses in the year that recently featured in the Coventry Evening Telegraph.

We did not seek the meeting. Mr. Joe Greenwell volunteered the information and came down here to tell us about it. Having seen my hon. Friend he went off to see the Secretary of State, where he said something interesting. He said, "Look. We're not doing this because we are sentimentally attached to Browns Lane. We're not doing this because we care deeply about Coventry, the employees or even the 1998 agreement. We're doing this because we showed Ford Motor Company that it is more expensive to close Browns Lane than to keep it going."

In addition to responding to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South, I should like the Minister to address the following, either now or later because this will not go away and must be answered by the Secretary of State's Department. Was a minute taken of Jaguar's view, as proven to the head board of Ford Motor Company in Detroit, that it would cost more to close Browns Lane than to keep it open? If that is the case, what has changed? We know that sales are down and that the exchange rate is adverse, but those factors were known at the time, so they cannot explain the difference between a situation in which it costs more to close Browns Lane and the situation now in which, allegedly, out of the blue, a saving of £80 million a year has materialised. I do not think that Joe Greenwell could explain that. I know that the unions have written to the Secretary of State and we need clarification.

If it is the case that there is no strong economic reason—no cash reason—for closing Browns Lane, why is Ford Motor Company taking that action now, with all the difficulties that that involves, because it is doing that with no regard for the serious solemn undertakings it entered into with the unions? I honestly cannot believe that the Ford Motor Company will reject the concept of good faith and resile from commitments by rejecting its undertakings. I do not believe that the Ford Motor Company that I know, which has always gone out of its way to honour its word and ensure that its credibility remains intact, has said its last word on the matter.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on gaining the debate. The attendance, as noted by other hon. Members, shows the significance of Jaguar for Coventry and the motor industry for the west midlands more generally.

The Government have great sympathy with the people of Coventry in the wake of Jaguar's announcement. The decision to halt trim and assembly operations at Browns Lane has been a heavy blow to the work force and their families. I acknowledge too, as my hon. Friends pointed out, that it was particularly hard to bear in view of the great efforts that the work force of Browns Lane put in over the years to improve quality and productivity at the plant.

On behalf of the Government, I reiterate our disappointment, especially in relation to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), that the company has not delivered on assurances that it gave to the trade unions on Browns Lane and the three-plant strategy. I share the concern that the trade unions and local MPs have yet to be given a detailed explanation of the reasons for that decision. However, I am pleased to report that the company and trade unions have agreed to meet shortly to discuss the way ahead. I cannot supply details of the specific terms of reference and the level at which the meeting should happen, but it is an important step. As for more general points about legislation, such an initiative would be in the spirit of the new information and consultation arrangements that the Government will introduce next spring.

As my hon. Friends pointed out, my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Secretary of State have taken part in meetings, and I can assure them that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have spoken forcefully and directly about the closure to Ford's senior management in the United States. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has repeated those arguments to Jaguar's management in the UK as part of her ongoing dialogue with Joe Greenwell, Jaguar's chairman and chief executive, on the issue. I hope that my hon. Friends are reassured that concern and disappointment have been expressed at the highest levels of Government to Ford's senior management. My hon. Friends in the region have conducted important lobbying and made significant contributions, including in today's debate, as many of them, as we heard, have constituents who are directly affected by the news.

Action clearly had to be taken for Jaguar to address its financial difficulties and remain a sustainable part of the automotive industry in the UK. Ford's Premier Automotive Group, of which Jaguar is a part, has lost more than $521 million in the past six months alone. Many of the global auto-industry markets, including Jaguar's key markets in the USA and Europe, have experienced savage price cuts as manufacturers strive to maintain market share, and that has hit Jaguar hard. If Ford had not taken steps to improve competitiveness, the long-term viability of the Jaguar business could have been at risk by those pressures. I share my hon. Friends' concerns, however, that the actions the company will now take in consultation with its union representatives must ultimately generate the ability to make profits, without which there can be no reinvestment for the future. While I welcome the fact that Jaguar has come up with a plan that requires no compulsory job losses, and that it has not decided to close Browns Lane entirely, none the less I accept my hon. Friends' concerns. Many functions will continue at the site. Jaguar's headquarters and administrative centre will remain in Coventry, as will the company's wood veneer manufacturing operation and the Jaguar heritage centre.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Not only will Ford's credibility be shot if it goes ahead with the removal of assembly operations, but no one will pay the slightest attention to undertakings on headquarters or the wood veneer operation remaining at Browns Lane. Once the assembly goes it is inconceivable that anything will remain there.

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right. Ford must consider that argument extremely carefully, which is why I began by reiterating our disappointment at its decisions, given the assurances that it made to the work force.

It is important that Jaguar retains its world-leading research and development centre at nearby Whitley. R and D is recognised by the Government in our manufacturing strategy as one of the key enablers for manufacturing success, so it is crucial that those efforts continue. Many people affected by Jaguar's restructuring may well find new employment opportunities at Gaydon, where 300 new jobs will be created directly as a result of the growth and success of Aston Martin, Jaguar's sister company within Ford's Premier Automotive Group. But I share the concern of my hon. Friends that what needs to emerge is a viable future and a more robust business footing that will ultimately benefit not only the workers remaining at Browns Lane, but those at Castle Bromwich and at Halewood. That is the result that must ensue from the painful decision being taken. We must ensure that we secure a sustainable long-term future for the company, its products and its work force here in the UK.

Let me address some of the wider comments that have been made in the debate and more broadly about the erosion of the west midlands industrial base. My hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) made an important point about the removal of Jaguar production abroad. I suppose we can be reassured that that is not what we are discussing. Final assembly of the XJ and XK models is not being removed from the UK to some foreign country, but it is crucial that we find a way to maintain that facility and that production in the west midlands.

On Peugeot, I am delighted to confirm that the European Commission has approved our application to give regional selective assistance to the company for further investment in its plant at Ryton. We fully recognise the significance of the plant to the economy of the west midlands and to the automotive sector in the UK more generally. It employs about 3,000 people directly and many more in the supply chain. By offering a grant to support further investment at the plant, the Government are doing everything in our power to secure its future. It is now for the company to decide how to proceed.

Mr. Cunningham: That is what is causing concern. The company seems reluctant to confirm whether it will accept that grant. That is why those in the Gallery will beat us up tonight. It is important that the Government try to get the company to make up its mind.

Jacqui Smith: I hope the company responds positively to the considerable efforts that the Government have made to assist it in gaining the grant and to ensure that the European Commission approved the application.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Decommissioning

1. John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress towards decommissioning. [193187]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): There have been four acts of decommissioning to date. The latest act occurred on 21 October 2003, when the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning reported that it had witnessed a third event in which IRA weapons were put beyond use. As the Prime Minister made clear at Leeds castle, the Government regard the completion of decommissioning by paramilitary groups as essential to progress in Northern Ireland.

John Robertson: The chairman of Sinn Fein is on record as describing any visible act of decommissioning as counterproductive. Does my hon. Friend agree that, for the decommissioning process to gain the confidence of the people of Northern Ireland, we cannot rely solely on the word of the paramilitaries or their political representatives? What steps does he envisage being able to take to convince the people of Northern Ireland that there is no prospect of the IRA retaining its arms while Sinn Fein exercises its authority in a future Executive?

Mr. Pearson: It is clear that, if there is to be public confidence in the decommissioning process, greater transparency is required in relation to the arms that are to be decommissioned and how long it will take to complete the process. We as a Government are clear that all paramilitaries must give up violence completely in a way that satisfies everyone and enables the people of Northern Ireland to move the process forward. Every party that wants to be in government must abide by the same democratic rules.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): Will the Minister confirm that Government policy is unchanged in the matter of decommissioning with regard to the IRA? I refer him to what the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons. He said:

> "It means giving up violence completely in a way that satisfies everyone and gives them confidence that the IRA has ceased its campaign, and enables us to move the democratic process forward, with every party that wants to be in government abiding by the same democratic rules."—[Official Report, 27 November 2002; Vol. 395, c. 309.]

Will the Minister confirm that that is still the policy of the Government and that they will carry it out?

Mr. Pearson: I am happy to confirm that. The Prime Minister put it far more eloquently than I could. The hon. Gentleman is right. We are adamant that all paramilitaries must give up violence completely, in a way that satisfies everyone in Northern Ireland. That remains our position.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): Following the Minister's answer to that question, will he refer to the fact that in March this year the Government declared at Hillsborough that there must be > "a complete, total and definite end to all paramilitary activity across the board"?

Do the Government intend to apply that requirement to the current process of decommissioning and/or peace, in view of the fact that paramilitaries associated with political parties with which the Minister is in dialogue are increasingly involved in drugs, extortion and protection rackets, or have the Government simply changed their mind?

Mr. Pearson: As Security Minister, I am well aware of the links between paramilitaries and organised crime. They are graphically demonstrated in the Independent Monitoring Commission report that was published earlier this year. The Government are clear that we want an end to all paramilitary activity. We want to take the gun out of politics for ever. That is what the people of Northern Ireland want and that is what, in the continuing dialogue that is going on at present, we are all aiming to achieve.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the Minister explain to the House how the Government intend to address the serious problem arising from the deficit of confidence in the Unionist community that General de Chastelain is the person best placed to verify further acts of decommissioning?

Mr. Pearson: As a Government we have total confidence in the integrity and abilities of General John de Chastelain. We accept, however, that there is an issue of public confidence in decommissioning and that greater transparency is required in the process. That is currently under discussion and it would not be appropriate for me to comment further at this stage.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): Will the Minister confirm, to put the matter beyond any doubt on the record, that the Government still believe that, to secure the enduring peace that we all want, decommissioning must be visible and conducted according to a clear and finite timetable?

Mr. Pearson: I am happy to make it clear that decommissioning is a vital component of the Good Friday agreement, which the Government want to see implemented. It is important that there is greater transparency. We have trust and confidence in General John de Chastelain, but as I said earlier, we need to ensure that paramilitaries give up violence and their weapons in a way that satisfies everyone. Greater transparency is required as part of that process, and we also want a definite time scale; the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right on that point.

General Practitioners

2. Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): If he will make a statement on changes to the provision of general practitioner out-of-hours services in Northern Ireland. [193190]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela Smith): From 1 January 2005, where GPs have chosen to opt out of providing out-of-hours services to their patients, statutory responsibility will pass to the health and social services boards. The boards are well advanced in detailed planning for out-of-hours services to ensure a smooth transition from the current to the new arrangements and to continue to provide a safe, effective service.

Mrs. Robinson: I thank the Minister for her response, but does she agree that, until now, the true costs of the out-of-hours work of GPs have been disguised? The funding required to establish and sustain new out-of-hours arrangements from 1 January will be a new cost. Has she made an assessment of the expected resultant costs over the first 12 months, and can she reassure me that other current services will not suffer as a result?

Angela Smith: I know that the hon. Lady has been concerned about the service provision, and I am pleased to be able to reassure her. She will no doubt be aware of the recent article in Doctor magazine that stated:

> "NI goodwill speeds opt-out", which shows how well the service is making that change. The cost of providing the service will be about £21 million in a full year and a good service will be provided. I assure her that the funds will be available to ensure that we have effective, safe and efficient out-of-hours services for all patients in Northern Ireland.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): Will the Minister confirm that there are doctors who do not want to work out of hours and that there are areas in Northern Ireland where there is great concern that people may not be getting the services that they require, particularly in rural areas?

Angela Smith: There may be some confusion about what is happening. The days when the doctor put on his overcoat over his pyjamas and rushed out in the middle of the night were a long time ago. What we are saying is that, where doctors wish to opt out of providing out-of-hours services, responsibility for them passes to the boards. I am well aware of the concerns about rural areas. That is why the boards have been carrying out detailed planning to ensure that we have a safe, efficient and effective service for patients throughout Northern Ireland.

Peace Process

3. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): If he will make a statement on the peace process. [193192]

5. Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): What further discussion is taking place in Northern Ireland with a view to re-establishing the Northern Ireland Assembly. [193194]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): We made good progress on the key points at the intensive negotiations at Leeds castle, and talks with the Northern Ireland parties and the Irish Government continue. As the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach have made clear, it is now very important that they reach a conclusion.

Ann Winterton: Surely the peace process cannot progress unless there is full and verifiable handing over of weapons by Sinn Fein-IRA, sooner rather than later. The token surrender of weapons to date is simply not good enough.

Mr. Murphy: The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson), made it clear that decommissioning is an essential part of any deal that has to be made to restore the institutions. Decommissioning is also an essential part of the Good Friday agreement in itself. The exchanges over the Floor of the House a few moments ago made it clear where the Government stand.

Mr. Tynan: May I encourage my right hon. Friend to continue the peace process, because as far as finding a solution to the problems that exist in Northern Ireland is concerned, re-establishing the Assembly is vital to the people of the Province? What recent discussion has he had with the new Irish Foreign Minister? If we are to continue co-operation and maintain momentum for the peace process, we must ensure that the relationship that existed previously with Brian Cowen continues with Dermot Ahern.

Mr. Murphy: I agree with my hon. Friend that success is important in the Northern Ireland peace process. We need good relations with the Irish Government, and I believe that they have never been better. I pay tribute to the work of Brian Cowen, who was Irish Minister for Foreign Affairs and is now Finance Minister. He played a significant role in the process and we wish him well in his new job. We also welcome Dermot Ahern, who will prove an able successor. My hon. Friend is right to bring the vital significance of the British and Irish Governments' working together to the attention of the House.

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire) (Con): While everyone agrees on the necessity of full decommissioning, the argument continues about how it can be brought about in a way that will satisfy the public, and in particular the citizens of Northern Ireland. In view of the fact that the Sinn Fein leader has accused the Government of trying to play politics with that important issue, for the avoidance of doubt, will the Secretary of State tell us the Government's minimum requirements for visibility in decommissioning?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the issue is important—it cannot be avoided and it is a vital part of the Good Friday agreement. Discussions are taking place between the parties and the Government, and I cannot go into the detail of how we will deal with the issue, because that would affect the talks. Unless there is sufficient transparency to induce confidence among people in Northern Ireland, whether they are Unionist or whether they are nationalist, we will not make progress. That lack of confidence was one reason why we did not make progress back in November 2003. He may rest assured that his general points about transparency and confidence are at the heart of the discussions.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle) (SDLP): Does the Secretary of State agree that, for the first time in history, the people of Ireland as a whole—north and south—voted on how they want to live together by overwhelmingly endorsing the Good Friday agreement? It is therefore every true democrat's duty to implement the will of the people, which means implementing all aspects of the agreement. Does he agree that any renegotiation of any aspect of that agreement would be undemocratic?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the importance of the agreement to Northern Ireland's future. He knows full well that the principles that underlie the agreement cannot be altered in any accommodation that we may arrive at. The details on power sharing, the north-south arrangements and the principle of consent are all vital to any future accommodation.

My hon. Friend knows that the operation of the agreement's institutions has been reviewed and we have an opportunity to reflect on how we can change it for the better. Even when we examine the operation of the agreement, any changes must be made by agreement. However, he is right to point out that the fundamental principles of the Good Friday agreement must lie at the heart of any future accommodation.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Does the Secretary of State agree on the need to ensure greater confidence in both communities in Northern Ireland, and particularly the Unionist community, before the discussions reach fulfilment and the Assembly returns?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman is right—at the end of the day, proper trust and confidence must be developed. He knows as well as me the reason why the Assembly has been suspended for more than two years, and it is nearly one year since there were elections in Northern Ireland for that Assembly. A lack of trust and confidence lies behind that situation. Any discussions must deal with the need to increase confidence, which is his point.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): The Secretary of State knows that policing is central to creating peace in Northern Ireland. I am sure that he has noted some ill-judged statements about policing that have been made recently. Will he ensure that the opinion of the oversight commissioner—an independent, impartial oversight commissioner—that Patten is being fully implemented with competence is not overlooked? Will he consider extending the oversight commissioner's tenure of office so that the public in Northern Ireland can base their opinion on his professional judgment and not on the party political propaganda or self-serving interests of others?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House about the work of the oversight commissioner. It is a vital part of our progress on policing in Northern Ireland. I greatly support what he has done to date and I shall reflect seriously on my hon. Friend's point about his term of office.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Do not demands for a statement that the war is over fundamentally miss the point? Although it sounds less dramatic, should not our goal be to ensure that all groups abide by paragraph 13 of the joint declaration, which means full and permanent cessation of all military activities? Does the Secretary of State therefore agree that it would be better for politicians from all parties to focus on implementing a measurable outcome in an existing declaration rather than fixating on a politically charged but practically undefined demand?

Mr. Murphy: As I have said several times this morning, the issue is confidence. The only way in which we can restore the institutions and fulfil what we have to fulfil in the Good Friday agreement is by ensuring sufficient confidence in all parts of the community, Unionist and nationalist, in Northern Ireland so that politicians can work together in an Executive and an Assembly and the important matters of paramilitary activity and decommissioning can be addressed. How we do that is the key. Unless people are confident that such progress is to be made, we cannot achieve our goals. However, I am reasonably optimistic that there is a will among parties in Northern Ireland to do a deal and restore those institutions.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): On Monday, the vice-chairman of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, Denis Bradley, made grossly irresponsible comments about attacks on police and district policing partnership members. He also made offensive political remarks that went way beyond his role and remit. Should not he now resign? If he does not, should not the Secretary of State remove him from an office for which he is clearly unfit?

Mr. Murphy: Obviously, Mr. Bradley expressed personal opinions, to which he is entitled. However, it is important to point out that he has been the subject of much intimidation in past months and that he is sincere in wanting progress on policing. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with that. I know that he can address the comments about the political situation more than adequately through debate. I understand what he says but I believe that everyone would agree with Mr. Bradley's emphasis on the fact that progress in the peace process was important for progress in policing.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): Will the Secretary of State confirm that steps towards so-called normalisation, for example the withdrawal of troops from Northern Ireland and dealing with terrorists on the run—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must be fair to the hon. Gentleman. I ask hon. Members not to hold conversations in the Chamber. Perhaps they could do that outside.

Mr. Lidington: Does the Secretary of State agree that issues such as the withdrawal of troops and dealing with terrorists on the run depend not only on decommissioning but on the clear cessation of all paramilitary activity and the effective end of the IRA as an active military organisation? Will he make it clear that the Government will not move on those normalisation issues without that clear end of paramilitary organisation and activity?

Mr. Murphy: That lies at the heart of the joint declaration, in paragraph 13. The Prime Minister has said that the acts of completion, as we have termed them, to which the hon. Gentleman referred will not happen unless there is an end to paramilitary activity and to the other issues that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I hope that those issues will be addressed in the current negotiations, so that we can move into the other areas that the hon. Gentleman described. We cannot do so, however, unless there are acts of completion on those points.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that reply. I welcome today's news that he is soon to meet representatives of the Ulster Political Research Group. Does he agree that it would build community confidence hugely if the loyalist paramilitaries decommissioned their arms, ended their paramilitary activity and renounced the vicious criminality which terrorises too many people in the loyalist communities? Would that not also open the way for the jobs and investment that the people desperately want to come into those communities?

Mr. Murphy: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman. It is vital that, as well as tackling republican paramilitary activity, we tackle such activity among the loyalists. As he rightly says, I hope to meet the UPRG, which represents loyalism of a certain type, next week. I shall also meet David Ervine of the Progressive Unionist party. The message is that we welcome political loyalism as a political force in Northern Ireland, but anything that involves criminality or paramilitary activity must be condemned very robustly, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said.

Paramilitary Activity

4. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on the current level of paramilitary activity in Northern Ireland. [193193]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): The Government remain concerned at the level of paramilitary activity and control exercised by both republican and loyalist paramilitary organisations within their communities. Internal tensions within loyalist paramilitary groups remain high, with continuing incidents. Dissident republicans continue to carry out attacks, although many of their activities have been thwarted, intercepted or nullified by the security forces. The Independent Monitoring Commission is due to report again on this issue shortly.

Mr. Robertson: A few moments ago, the Secretary of State told my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) that relations with the Irish Republic were very good. Can the Minister therefore explain why the Irish Republic refuses to hand over Paddy Dixon, who was wanted for questioning in connection with the Omagh bombing? Can he also tell me whether Paddy Dixon has been relocated to the United Kingdom? He was recently stopped by the authorities in Cardiff and found to have a great deal of cash on him. Why was the Police Service of Northern Ireland not alerted to the fact that he was in Great Britain?

Mr. Pearson: What I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that there is a good, strong level of co-operation between the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Garda Siochana on a wide range of issues, which certainly include dealing with paramilitaries and with the issue of organised criminal activity. So far as the individual whom he mentioned is concerned, I will look into that issue and get back to him.

Mr. Tony Clarke (Northampton, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend share my concern at the continued involvement of paramilitaries in the rise in hate crime in Northern Ireland? Will he ask the PSNI to look at two issues? One is the continuing protection and extortion rackets run by loyalist paramilitaries and aimed against ethnic communities that have small businesses in Northern Ireland. The second is the involvement of the British National party and the White Nationalist party on those estates, almost at the request—and certainly with the co-operation—of some of the paramilitaries there—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members are being far too noisy.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. Friend is right to point out the continuing level of paramilitary activity in Northern Ireland. In the first nine months of this year, there were 184 paramilitary attacks, and three times more loyalist attacks than republican attacks. Extortion and organised crime are particular issues. The police made an arrest only last week, which shows that they are very much on the case so far as dealing with extortion is concerned. My hon. Friend is also right to point out the issue of racism and the involvement of the BNP. This is something that the Government are extremely aware of, and we are committed, through the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments, to combat racism wherever it occurs.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): It is believed that between £250 million and £500 million is being taken up by criminals in Northern Ireland. Paramilitary activity is funded by illegal activity. Apparently the Assets Recovery Agency has successfully picked up about £3 million to date, but does the Minister accept that much more must be done to disrupt paramilitary activity and that that means cutting those people away from their financing? Can he assure us that, if it is needed, the ARA will be granted more funding to cut out the sale of counterfeit goods, the smuggling of tobacco and cigarettes and, of course, the importation of illegal fireworks from China?

Mr. Pearson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that more needs to be done, and it is being done at the moment. The PSNI has a range of activities under way to tackle organised crime. The Assets Recovery Agency has had some major successes in recent weeks and, as he will be aware, went to court only last week with another major seizure. We need to hit criminals where it hurts them, in the pocket, as well as bringing them to justice. The Assets Recovery Agency has an adequate budget, which increased by 20 per cent. this year. We shall continue to keep that under review.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [193851] Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 27 October.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I have had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Miller: My right hon. Friend will know that as health indicators have continued to improve, one set of statistics nevertheless continues to give public concern—that of cancer. That is partly because diagnostic techniques have improved and partly because things that used to kill people before cancer have been wiped out through good medication and so on. What will my right hon. Friend do to help improve public understanding of that disease, particularly in terms of improving issues around lifestyle, and what will he do to improve screening within the NHS for the disease?

The Prime Minister: The public health White Paper will be published shortly. It is worth pointing out to the House that there is a huge extra investment that is going into cancer services at the moment, with more than 1,000 extra cancer consultants and more than 1,000 items of modern equipment to diagnose and treat cancer. I should also say to the House that over the past seven years, the number of premature deaths through cancer is down by over 12 per cent.; that is 33,000 lives saved.

However, we recognise that we have to do more, and today my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is announcing that we are investing almost £40 million over the next two years to fund a national bowel cancer screening programme. That will begin in April 2006 and this is all part of the investment and reform programme being rolled out across the whole of the health service.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Last week the Prime Minister said there was no question of cutting the size of the Army. That answer, as he must know, was quite wrong. Will he now correct it?

The Prime Minister: We have increased the amount of investment in defence considerably over the past few years. It is correct, as we have said, that we are going to reduce the number of battalions, I think from 40 to 36—we will announce the results of the review shortly—but actually, overall the number of people in our armed forces will not be reduced.

Mr. Howard: Well, I have here a statement from the Chief of the General Staff in which he says that Army numbers are falling from more than 108,000 to 102,000. Is the Prime Minister saying that the Chief of the General Staff does not know what he is talking about?

The Prime Minister: I am certainly not saying that. What I am saying, however, is that the number of people employed in the armed forces overall is not going to fall. We retain the commitment to invest in our armed forces; we will carry on doing so. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman will know that, as a result of the strategic defence review, we decided that we needed to reconfigure the money that we spend on defence capability, and we will be spending that money on, for example, things like strategic lift capability, where we need new equipment. Also, other people will be employed in our armed forces to provide better logistic services. It is therefore true that fewer will be employed in one area and more will be employed in other areas. Overall, however, the number of people supporting our armed forces is not falling.

Mr. Howard: I think that we actually got an admission from the Prime Minister that the answer that he gave this House last week was wrong. Does not it say everything about the Government's priorities that, when there are already more civil servants in the Department for Work and Pensions than there are soldiers in the British Army, the Government are cutting the Army by more than 6,000 men and women? In a dangerous world, we need stronger forces and a Prime Minister who gives straight answers. Is it not clear that under this Government we have neither?

The Prime Minister: First, I find it extraordinary that the right hon. and learned Gentleman accuses us of cutting defence forces in circumstances in which he and his party are pledged to freeze defence spending. The shadow Chancellor has said that every budget, apart from schools and hospitals, will be frozen in cash terms. It is true that his defence spokesman has said something different. Perhaps he will now tell us whether the shadow Chancellor is right to say that all budgets other than schools and hospitals will be frozen in cash terms.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): Now that the Association of Chief Police Officers is saying that a complete ban on the physical punishment of children would be more workable than the partial ban proposed in the Children Bill, would my right hon. Friend be prepared to meet a small group of Members this week to discuss whether we can have a free vote on what is a fundamental issue of conscience?

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to meet my hon. Friend and any other Members on this issue. My view is that there is a common-sense way through this issue. It is important that we recognise that most parents can tell the difference between disciplining their child and abuse of their child. I know that there are strong arguments on all sides in relation to this matter, and I shall listen carefully to any argument that he puts to me. Sometimes in these circumstances, however, it is best to feel one's way instinctively as a parent, rather than as a politician.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): Last week, the Prime Minister assured us that the Black Watch would return home by Christmas. The clear impression conveyed was that that would mark the end of the requirement for British forces to carry out this additional responsibility. Can I clarify whether that is the case?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we have said that the Black Watch will come back by Christmas. As to what then happens, we cannot be sure at the moment. We do not believe that there will be a further requirement for other troops, but I cannot guarantee that, because, obviously, I do not know the situation that may arise. What I do know is that if there is any contingency—I think that this is what the Chief of the Defence Staff was saying—we are able to meet it. I said, with the authority of the Chief of the Defence Staff, that the Black Watch will be back by Christmas, and that holds.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Prime Minister for that reply. May I press him further on one aspect? Has he sought, or been given, any assurances by the United States Government that if the Black Watch is withdrawn in due course, its position will be filled in by American rather than British troops?

The Prime Minister: I have not been given such an assurance, and I have not sought such an assurance. First, we can be immensely proud of the work that our troops are doing in Iraq. We can be proud of the Black Watch and the work that it is doing. But we are engaged in a joint operation in Iraq with this purpose in mind: to make sure that elections in Iraq can take place in January. If they can, it will be the biggest blow for freedom, stability and prosperity in that country that we can imagine. We should not go into this with an attitude of mind that tries continually to pick holes in the strategy. That does not help the overall joint effort in Iraq, which I believe passionately is in the interests of the security of this country.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend tell us what steps his Government are taking to encourage agencies such as the Independent Committee for the Supervision of Telephone Information Services, Ofcom and the telecoms network operators to protect our constituents from organisations, both at home and abroad, that are dispersing automatic network diallers over the internet? The practice has caused many of our constituents to incur enormous telephone bills through no action and no fault of their own.

The Prime Minister: I think I had better consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and get back to my hon. Friend to tell him what we are doing; but I can tell from the calls coming from behind me that this is an issue of deep concern.

Q2. [193852] Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): The Prime Minister will know that Norfolk police authority, along with many others, faces a serious funding shortfall next year. At the same time, the Home Office is imposing yet more bureaucratic burdens. Will the Prime Minister give a guarantee that front-line policing will not suffer as a result?

The Prime Minister: I understand that there are record police numbers in Norfolk. That, of course, is a result of the Government's extra investment in policing. Of course we want that to be maintained. As well as providing record numbers of police not just in Norfolk but throughout the country, we are increasing the number of community support officers and support staff. This is all part of bringing back community policing for today's world, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that I want to see it extended, not curtailed.

Q3. [193853] Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Modernisation of the accident and emergency services is bringing real improvements to patient experience and safety. Sir George Alberti's report, published yesterday, made that clear. How can we ensure that if there are local difficulties—as there are in the Surrey and Sussex trust, where most services have been transferred to another hospital and ambulances are waiting for up to two hours—they do not undermine the fantastic work that is going on?

The Prime Minister: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's concern. It is important for the strategic health authority to decide how local needs can best be met, but my hon. Friend is right to point out that, as yesterday's report said, accident and emergency care has undergone something of a transformation over the past few years. It is good to note that people coming from abroad—from America and Australia, for instance—having observed our accident and emergency services, describe them as an example that should be followed elsewhere. Nevertheless, that does not take away the difficulties that can arise locally. My hon. Friend can make representations about them to the strategic health authority, but I think that in the end such decisions are best made locally.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): The answer to the completely bogus point made by the Prime Minister a few moments ago is that both the shadow Chancellor and the shadow Defence Secretary are pledged to increase spending on Britain's front-line forces by £2.7 billion. Why, on Friday this week, is the Prime Minister going to sign a constitution that will entrench Europe's economic failings, and drag Britain down as well?

The Prime Minister: Just before I get on to that point, I should like to continue the discussion on defence spending a little longer, if I may. It simply is not right. How can the right hon. and learned Gentleman have the shadow Chancellor saying that he is going to impose that—[Interruption.] Oh, yes. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Prime Minister will leave the subject of defence now, and answer the question.

The Prime Minister: We shall continue that discussion over the coming months. As for Europe, we want to sign the treaty because we think that it modernises European institutions. When Europe is operating as a Europe of 25, or perhaps 27 and later 30 countries, it is important to have sensible rules in Europe; but that protects absolutely the right of this country to set its tax rates and its foreign and defence policy, and it preserves our opt-in on asylum and immigration. It is therefore a sensible deal for this country. We know where the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends want to go: they want to go out of Europe, and that is not sensible.

Mr. Howard: The description that I gave and which I shall repeat—that the constitution will comes from a man who was the Prime Minister's chief economic adviser for six and a half years. Should we not take his advice seriously?

> "entrench Europe's economic failings and drag Britain down too"—

The Prime Minister: I am sure that I always took his advice seriously, but it is important to recognise that a Europe of 25 is a Europe that Britain should be part of. Why? Because 60 per cent. of our trade is with Europe, millions of British jobs depend on our being in the European Union—[Interruption.] The Tory party actually wants to use the refusal of this treaty as a means of renegotiating existing membership of the European Union. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] So let us be quite clear: the right hon. and learned Gentleman's opposition to this new treaty is not about the treaty itself; it is about using the treaty as an excuse to renegotiate existing terms of European membership, which means getting out of Europe. Perhaps he will at least confirm this: that it is his policy to renegotiate our existing terms of membership.

Mr. Howard: Well, let me tell the Prime Minister a few more things that his adviser said. He said this morning that > "those in favour of the constitution would like to box people in to suggesting the only alternative . . . is leaving the European Union . . . that is not the case at all."

He continued:

> "The British government never really thought through its own position. First, it opposed a written constitution and then it put forward its own draft, which was treated with contempt. Then there was all that nonsense about tidying up . . . There was no strategic thinking."

So why is the Prime Minister going to Rome on Friday to sign up to a constitution that he himself said was never necessary, which his advisers say is damaging for Britain, and which the British people overwhelmingly do not want? He promised that he would but his own adviser says that he was "gutless". Is it not now clear that this Prime Minister is all talk?

> "stand up for Britain's interests in Europe",

The Prime Minister: I shall tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman what is gutless. It is gutless to run from the UK Independence party into a position—[Interruption.] Oh yes, that is what is gutless. He has ended up in a situation whereby his policy now is to renegotiate Britain's existing terms of membership, which would mean that Britain would face either humiliation in that negotiation, or withdrawal from Europe. I agree that it is difficult sometimes in this country to make the case for Europe, but I will carry on making that case because it is right and in Britain's interest. A true leader would stand up to UKIP, not run from it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Q4. [193854] David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is genuine concern in the country about various aspects of the Gambling Bill, which is due to be debated shortly, and in particular about the establishment of very large casinos? Instead of trying to encourage further gambling and debt, would it not be far more sensible to reduce these problems? The last thing that we want is a casino-type society. Ministers should reconsider the whole matter.

The Prime Minister: I entirely understand the concerns that my hon. Friend and others have expressed, but it is important to realise that 90 per cent. of that Bill is actually about regulating gambling better and more strictly. For example, it will have restrictions on access to gambling, particularly in respect of children, that are being introduced literally for the first time. It is also important to emphasise that where one of these casino leisure complexes is sought, any local authority has the right to declare that it will have no such complexes in its area at all.

The issue that we must really decide on is this. We are modernising in a sensible way the overall gambling laws. Let us be clear: this process has been going on for four years and, until very recently, with a large measure of cross-party support. The fact is that as well as better regulating gambling, the Bill will allow some of these large casino leisure complexes—probably 20 to 40—in areas that will be regenerated with hundreds of millions of pounds of investment and thousands of jobs. As the debate proceeds through the House of Commons, those arguments will become a little clearer.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Further to that answer, can the Prime Minister elaborate on which British interests will be served by the Gambling Bill? Does it not, in fact, provide further evidence of the fast-evolving and special, if not unique, relationship between this Prime Minister and the United States?

The Prime Minister: Many British companies also want to be involved in casino and leisure complexes, as they are involved in gambling across the country. It is also worth reminding the House—and perhaps, through it, the country—that this process began with an independent report by Sir Alan Budd in 2001 and we then had two lots of Scrutiny Committee deliberations on a draft Bill, so it is not true that we have ignored it. About 130 of the 160 recommendations were accepted. As to the others, there will be ample opportunity to debate them during the course of the Bill. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that 90 per cent. of the Bill is actually about establishing better regulation. People on both sides of the House have been saying for years that we should modernise our gaming laws, and that is what we are trying to do.

Q5. [193855] David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): Iraq has divided this House as it has divided this nation. However, there is a position on which we should all agree: that the innocents in Iraq are the children. Within my Midlothian constituency is a young woman, Katrina Turner, who was watching television 19 months ago and saw a young girl, Hannan, get burned beyond recognition. Over those 19 months she has waged a personal campaign, as a result of which Hannan is now in Scotland with my constituent. Tomorrow the girl is going to a special burns unit at St. John's hospital to receive treatment—painful treatment—that will take up to six months or longer to complete. Can I ask the Prime Minister to use his good offices to talk to world leaders, to recognise the fact that there are no burns units in Iraq and to make a plea for people in Iraq—and, indeed, throughout the world—to be able to get that sort of treatment?

The Prime Minister: The point that my hon. Friend makes is right. Of course, specialist health services suffered enormously under the previous regime and it will take a long time for Iraq to catch up to UK and international standards. I can tell my hon. Friend that there is a multi-donor trust fund, managed by the World Bank and the United Nations, which provides funds precisely for those types of specialist services. The UK is contributing about £70 million to those funds this year, and we are also working with the Iraqi ministry of health to try to make sure that we develop those specialist services. At the present time, I have to say, most of the emphasis in Iraq is on primary and emergency care, which is being introduced across the country for the first time in a proper and measured way. The Iraqis want to move on to specialist medical services and I can assure my hon. Friend that we will help them to do so.

Q6. [193856] Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): A group of former inhabitants of the island of Diego Garcia, who were dispossessed under a previous Labour Government, have started arriving in the UK and are currently being housed at the expense of the residents of Reigate and Banstead in Surrey, and thousands more could be on the way. Will the Prime Minister explain why my constituents in a small Surrey borough should pay substantial housing and legal costs as a result? Can he also explain why appeals to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and to the Deputy Prime Minister himself for help have so far gone unanswered?

The Prime Minister: I think it is because of the concern that if we start providing finance for this particular case, we would have to provide it for a whole series of others. The hon. Gentleman refers to thousands of people coming in, but that is an exaggeration. I shall have to look into the precise numbers that we anticipate, but I am told at the moment that it is far fewer—perhaps 40 so far. I will look into it very carefully and get back to the hon. Gentleman about it. As I said, the concern has been that if we start providing funding in these circumstances, there is no reason why we should not provide it across the board.

Q7. [193857] Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): A decade ago, my friend won the Labour leadership on a manifesto promising change and renewal. Now, after seven years in government, can he think of a single dramatic act of renewal that would make the British public sit up and take notice? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: Actually, I can think of several—[Interruption.]—apart from the fact that we have had two successive Labour Governments. That is one renewal. What is more, we have had economic stability in place of boom and bust; we have had 2 million more jobs in place of 3 million unemployed; we have had a national minimum wage in place instead of no minimum wage; we have had record investment in health and education in place of cuts; and we have had half a million children lifted out of poverty. That is some renewal. Maybe my hon. Friend should go back and tell his constituents about it.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Has the Prime Minister seen the paper published by the Department for Health advocating the reintroduction into the NHS of practice-based commissioning—what we used to call GP fundholding? Will he confirm that it is the policy of this Government, as it was of their predecessor, to extend the opportunity of practice-based commissioning to any GP who wants to take advantage of it? Will he also confirm that the excellent policy set out in the paper by the Secretary of State for Health has the unqualified support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

The Prime Minister: First, the policy is most certainly not a return to GP fundholding. We have no intention of reintroducing that two-tier system. However, it is true that we are devolving money down to the front line of the health service, as well as putting record investment into the NHS. If the right hon. Gentleman is saying that, having read that document, he supports it, I am delighted.

Q8. [193858] Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): This week saw the sixth anniversary of the establishment of the new deal for lone parents. So far, 270,000 lone parents have found their way into work. That is why unemployment in my constituency has fallen by 53 per cent. since May 1997 and why, directly as a result of the new deal, 420 lone parents in Weaver Vale are now in work. However, 1,188 people in my constituency remain unemployed. What does my right hon. Friend propose to do to ensure that everyone in my constituency who wants a job gets the opportunity to work?

The Prime Minister: I am glad that the new deal has had such a positive impact in my hon. Friend's constituency. It has helped hundreds of thousands of people—lone parents and young people—to get off benefit and into work. It is a tragedy that the Opposition are committed to abolishing it. That would be a very regressive step. We intend to extend it and, through tax credits and the other help that we give people, to make work pay. In addition, the new training and skills measures and the extension of child care will give many people the chance to acquire new skills and get help with looking after children. That is all part of creating a society in which everyone who wants to work is able to do so.

Q9. [193859] Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): Last month's report from the organisation Safer World identified that at least £450 million is spent subsidising UK arms exports. Would not taxpayers' money be better spent on local health services, such as those offered by Cranleigh Village hospital and Milford hospital in my constituency, which are so much valued by my constituents?

The Prime Minister: I shall have to check into the figure of £450 million but, if that covers defence sales as a whole and not just arms sales, it would be extraordinary if the Liberal Democrats were to say that we should not provide any support for our defence industry, which involves many thousands of jobs in this country. I do not think that it is wrong for this country, under the proper guidelines, to sell defence equipment. That is an important part of our manufacturing base.

Q10. [193860] Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): Last year, I received many letters from constituents complaining about the abuse of fireworks. Last week, Mrs. Catherine Foster wrote to me to say how different things are this year and how much quieter it is as a result of Government legislation. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that the efforts that have been made to tackle the problem will continue so that all our constituents can enjoy this time of year without worrying about the distress caused to their pets?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted that the legislation has had that impact on my hon. Friend's constituency. The introduction of fixed-penalty notices for firework offences has given the police a power that they can use easily and prevents the need for a long drawn-out court hearing. The police are able to take swift action, and that is all part of our measures on antisocial behaviour. We have closed down crack houses, shut down pubs and clubs where violence happens and under-age drinking goes on, and introduced antisocial behaviour orders. It is a question of ensuring that we give the power to local communities—police, local authorities and the local residents—to take action against that menace. In general, the powers have been widely welcomed.

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire) (Con): Is it not a serious setback to the tremendous efforts being made to prevent weapons proliferation to rogue states that some highly sensitive nuclear equipment and a very large quantity of high-quality explosives have gone missing in Iraq? Do the Government have any say in the protection and security of those very sensitive sites, either through our diplomatic services or our forces on the ground? If not, why not?

The Prime Minister: We do, of course. I think that I am right in saying that that was a result of the immediate aftermath of the conflict in Iraq and that nothing has gone missing in recent times, but we are awaiting a report from the International Atomic Energy Agency. We will obviously act on that report, but until we have the report, we do not know what the precise facts of the situation are, and they may be somewhat different from how they appear.

Q11. [193861] Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): Derbyshire constabulary and the crime and disorder reduction partnership in South Derbyshire have made tremendous progress in pressing down on crime in my area. I met representatives of the police authority last week to discuss their analysis of funding needs in the coming year and their bid for community support officers. Will my right hon. Friend commend to the Home Secretary their proposals for CSOs? Can he give me some assurance on their future funding?

The Prime Minister: Community support officers are having a big impact, along with neighbourhood wardens, in support of local police, particularly in dealing with antisocial behaviour. I can assure my hon. Friend that, as I said a moment or two ago, we want to see that encouraged and extended, not curtailed. The important thing is not just to have extra numbers of uniformed people on the ground, but to ensure that they have the powers to act where necessary. The combination of the additional police and community support officers and the powers is making a real difference, and as the report on antisocial behaviour that will be published tomorrow indicates, that is now beginning to have a real impact for the better on people's lives in this country.

Points of Order

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), the Prime Minister said that only a few dozen Ilois islanders would apparently come to the United Kingdom. He should have been aware that there are about 4,300—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order; it relates to the Prime Minister's reply. Take it up with the Prime Minister.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A few minutes ago, the Prime Minister stated that there would be no reduction in the size of Her Majesty's armed forces. You will recall—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a continuation of Prime Minister's Question Time.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am trying to answer a point of order. The hon. Gentleman is a bit quick.

If there is any concern about the Prime Minister's reply, drop him a note, and I am sure that he will answer.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 19 October, I wrote to the Minister for Local and Regional Government about the people from Diego Garcia, who were referred to in Prime Minister's questions, asking him urgently to contact Reigate and Banstead council to provide advice and assistance. It is simply unfair that my constituents and those of my other hon. Friends whose constituencies are in Surrey should be faced with footing the bill for an event that is entirely of the Government's making—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to stop the hon. Gentleman. If he and other hon. Members who represent the area have a difficulty and a concern about these matters, I am very generous in offering Adjournment debates, particularly when a group of MPs is interested. The hon. Gentleman should raise the issue in an Adjournment debate.

Norman Baker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask for your protection for the proper role of the House of Commons. At 9 o'clock this morning, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs announced a major change in environment policy and did so to a collection of journalists and pressure-group people. That change is an application for an increase in carbon emissions—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. He applied to me for an urgent question. When I refuse an urgent question, I do not give any reason why, and I do not expect hon. Members to try to raise the issue on a point of order. The Minister to whom the hon. Gentleman refers has made a written statement to the House, and he is perfectly entitled to pursue that matter through oral or written questions.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that last week I raised the issue with you of Ministers talking to the press and issuing press releases on changes in Government policy without coming to the House first. Today, lots of newspapers report a change in Government policy on forced marriages for Asians—a very important issue—and again, the Home Secretary has not sought to come to the House to make a statement but has talked to the press first. I suggested to you in my point of order last week that, if that continued to happen and your ruling on this matter was continually flouted, you should bring certain Ministers to the House and ask for an explanation. I ask for your further ruling on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I understand from the Clerk that there is a written statement about that matter, so the Minister has acted properly, but I undertake to look at the material that the hon. Gentleman has if he sends it to Speaker's House.

St. George's Day (Public Holiday)

12.35 pm

Mr. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make St. George's Day a public holiday in England in place of the May Day public holiday.

My Bill would designate St. George's day, 23 April, as an annual national public holiday in England. If that date were to fall during a weekend, the following Monday would be a public holiday.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to introduce a Bill on an issue that I sincerely believe to be dear to the hearts of many. The date of 23 April, as the day of the patron saint of England, means a great deal to people throughout our green and pleasant land, but sadly it has become undervalued in recent times. Before I ask the House to vote in favour of giving the people of England a new public holiday to recognise St. George, I should perhaps say a little about the great man himself.

George lived during the 3rd and 4th centuries and spent much of his time as a warrior in the area that we now know as the middle east. He became widely known for his chivalrous behaviour, protecting women and fighting evil. He was noted for his dependence of faith, might of arms and largess to the poor. Devotion to George became commonplace during the 10th century—some 500 years after his martyr's death. The stories of George slaying the dragon emerged later as his legend grew. It is believed that his adoption as a patron saint of England first occurred in 1061 when a church in Doncaster was dedicated to him. As crusaders returned from the middle east, they brought with them stories of the great George and his bravery on the battlefield. Indeed, the red cross on the flag of England might have come into being at the same time.

If the Bill were to reach the statute book, it would not be the first time that St. George's day was a public holiday in England. In 1222, at the Council of Oxford, 23 April was declared a public holiday. The popularity of the day quickly grew in England and it was soon celebrated every year with feasting in towns and cities throughout the land. In 1348, King Edward III introduced the battle cry, "St. George for England", and after the battle of Agincourt in 1415, St. George's day became one of the main features of the year. St. George became the patron saint of England around that time, but it is not clear exactly when. Sadly, the traditions have slowly died away over the centuries, but I am glad to stand before the House today as part of their resurgence.

I believe that all constituents of English Members would be delighted if St. George's day were reintroduced as a national holiday. However, I make it clear that I am also in favour of extending the same rights for St. Andrew's day in Scotland and St. David's day in Wales, but as you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, I shall leave that to other hon. Members, although I am sure that some of my reasoning would be valid in all parts of the United Kingdom.

The history of the day rightly has religious significance, but I am certain that the legend of St. George and 23 April could be celebrated in such a way as to ensure that everyone felt included. If the day were again to become a public holiday, it could be one of the most inclusive days in our calendar because many existing public holidays are significant to only the Christian faith. As a national holiday for England, St. George's day could become a wonderful springtime celebration, in which everyone takes part in being proud of our history, culture and English heritage.

However, it is not just me who wishes formally to recognise the day. Many people and organisations are clamouring for St. George's day to be given adequate recognition. Only this week, a third of members of the Trades Union Congress voted in favour of reclaiming the day for public enjoyment and celebration. The Royal Society of St. George is also doing an enormous amount to promote St. George's day. Indeed, it is fast becoming a national event. In my constituency and home town of Romford, Havering council ensured that the flag of St. George was displayed throughout the marketplace on 23 April as traders proudly displayed the flag from every stall, as schools held competitions and as children around the borough dressed in red and white specially for the occasion, while red roses were handed out at railway stations by my local St. George's committee.

Many people already choose to celebrate St. George's day because they know that it represents the true spirit of England. To make it a public holiday would be a wonderful opportunity for all the people of England to participate in events and parties celebrating our nation. A fine example of that in practice is Ireland and Northern Ireland, where St. Patrick's day—17 March—is famously celebrated. The people of both sides of the border have a day off, enjoying time with their families and taking part in parades and other celebrations.

In Switzerland on 1 August this year I was pleased to attend its celebrations of Swiss national day. Flags were displayed from every balcony and there were open air concerts, firework displays, alpine bands parading through the streets and the sound of cow bells echoing from every mountain. Gibraltar's national day on 10 September is a magnificent celebration of the Gibraltarian people, showing not only their pride in being British, but also their love of their homeland—the rock itself. Australia, New Zealand, Canada, the United States and scores of other countries also celebrate their national days in style. It is no coincidence that all those nations have a strong sense of national identity and pride, something that can only be a source of strength and unity in any country. I hope that England will follow their example and give this country an annual day to remember and cherish.

However, some of those things have been associated with less desirable elements. A tiny minority have used the symbols of our patriotism to promote causes of fear and intolerance. It is high time that we reclaim the flag of St. George and his truly English values for all the people of England. It is time that we promoted pride in our nation; pride in our flag; pride in our English way of life. I would even argue that our country is crying out for an opportunity to celebrate all those things.

As such, recent performances in the Olympics, success in the rugby World cup and the resurgence of England's football team in recent years have all led to the St. George cross becoming a near permanent feature in many high streets, pubs and clubs all over England. It seems that the people of England crave an occasion on which they can show their pride in St. George, their flag and, most importantly, their country. I suggest that 23 April would be the ideal day to allow our nation to come together and celebrate the country of which we are all proud. I ask hon. Members to join me in crying for God, Harry, England and St. George and vote in favour of the Bill. I commend the Bill to the House.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): To return from planet Zarg where we have spent the past 10 minutes, the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Rosindell) failed to mention one aspect of his Bill. The motion states:

> "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make St. George's Day a public holiday in England in place of the May Day public holiday."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Judging from their reaction, I suspect that that bothers my hon. Friends and, I believe, other hon. Members. It will be interesting to see whether, in the Division that will follow, Tory Front Benchers will go into the Aye Lobby to attack the labour movement and working people, or whether they will join us in the No Lobby. May day is part of the history of the labour movement, the Labour party and trade unions. The public holiday was introduced by the 1974–79 Labour Government, but it was always an aspiration of the labour and trade union movement to have a May day holiday in the years when miners were being slaughtered by the hundreds in work, and when there was a battle for improved working terms and conditions. Although it was not fundamental to people's lives, it was always a dream to have such a holiday.

May day also has religious connotations, and is a celebration of the Virgin Mary and St. Joseph the worker—[Interruption.] I can see that that reference has gone down well among the Tories, as it always does. The Bill is an attack on working people, and the dreams and aspirations of the labour movement, which has been in existence for more than 100 years. In fact, the ambition to make May day a bank holiday predates the foundation of the labour and trade union movement, and is something that many Labour Members would defend as long as we have breath in our bodies. Finally, I was born into the labour movement and I intend to die in it, although not just yet. This is an over-my-dead-body issue, and I will defend May day as long as I live and breathe.

Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill [Lords] (Programme) (No.2)

1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I beg to move,

That the programme order of 14th June 2004 in relation to the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill [Lords] be varied as follows—

Consideration and Third Reading

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order shall be omitted.
2. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table.
3. The proceedings shown in the first column of the Table shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column of the Table.

TABLE

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
New Clauses, New Schedules and amendments to Clauses 1 to 15.	Two and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.
Amendments to Clauses 16 to 21 and Schedule 1.	Four and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.
Amendments to Clauses 22 to 24, Schedule 2, Clauses 25 and 26, Schedule 3, Clause 27, Schedule 4, Clauses 28 and 29, Schedule 5, Clauses 30 and 31, Schedule 6, Clauses 32 to 41, Schedule 7, Clause 42, Schedule 8, Clauses 43 to 47, Schedule 9, Clauses 48 to 52, Schedules 10 and 11, Clause 53, Schedule 12, Clauses 54 to 57 and remaining proceedings on the Bill.	Five and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.

4. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the day on which proceedings on consideration are commenced.

Throughout the deliberations on the Bill, we have always tried to achieve consensus, and I think that for the most part we have managed to do so. There has been good communication and consultation throughout. I know that the Opposition have views about programme motions. I hope that they will not divide the House, but if they do so, we will continue to have constructive discussions later.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister, who is right that we have had a great deal of consensus during the passage of the Bill. That is quite right, because of the sensitive subject matter and the fact that the Government have tried to do something in this area. However, this Bill started its passage back in December last year in another place. It has taken a long time to get here and it has been changed many times on its way. As late as this morning, we are seeing fresh announcements from the Home Office that concern the subject matter of the Bill. The motion is most inappropriate in this case because it will not give us an opportunity for proper discussion. I have no choice but to divide the House as a matter of principle.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I think that it is important for us to programme the proceedings, but I would be grateful to know whether my hon. Friend the Minister can assure the House that we will have enough time to discuss the need for mandatory risk assessments in family court proceedings, because there are concerns about children who have been killed when courts have ordered residence or contact orders that have been unsupervised.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) has raised an important issue—one of many substantial issues that will not, sadly, be adequately debated in one day of Report and Third Reading. That is the real problem: we simply do not enough time to do justice to what is a very important and complicated Bill on which many people will wish to put to the Government serious arguments about its application in due course. That is why the Liberal Democrats also oppose the motion.

1.4 pm

Paul Goggins: I anticipate that we will get to the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown). I certainly hope that we will do so, and that we will get to a great many others as well. The sooner we can proceed to those discussions, the better.

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 11—Victims of persons subject to hospital order with restriction order: information.

Government new clause 12—Victims of persons subject to hospital direction and limitation direction: representations.

Government new clause 13—Victims of persons subject to hospital direction and limitation direction: information.

Government new clause 14—Victims of persons subject to transfer direction and restriction direction: representations.

Government amendments Nos. 34 to 39.

Paul Goggins: The first group consists exclusively of Government amendments and new clauses. The amendments may appear detailed and complicated, but they seek to achieve a simple aim and, I believe, a shared aim, namely, that victims of serious sexual or violent offending should have the right to information about the release of the offender, whether the offender has received a prison sentence or has been dealt with under mental health legislation.

The amendments combined effect is that when the court sentences for a serious sexual or violent offence, the local probation board acquires a duty to identify the victim of the offence. If the victim wishes, they can be kept informed about decisions in relation to the offender's release. They have the right to make representations about measures to be taken for their protection and to be informed about those measures. That duty already exists under section 69 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 in cases in which the offender receives a prison sentence. These provisions extend it to cases in which the offender is dealt with under mental health legislation, whether or not the offender is under a prison sentence.

The amendments consolidate section 69 of the 2000 Act with new provisions covering the three powers in the Mental Health Act 1983, under which such offenders may be detained. Those powers are first, a restricted hospital order; secondly, a transfer direction with restrictions, which is made by the Home Secretary to transfer a mentally disordered prisoner to hospital for treatment; and thirdly, a hospital direction, which is made by the court to direct admission of a prisoner to hospital at the time of sentencing. Those provisions are necessarily lengthy, because they cover each detention authority separately. However, their combined effect is that whichever the detention authority—even if it changes during sentence—the victim retains the right to be informed that a decision on release is being made and to make representations about conditions for their protection and that of their family.

The Home Secretary, the mental health review tribunal or the parole board may take decisions on the discharge of mentally disordered offenders and the provisions place a duty on each decision-making body to advise the relevant local probation board. The probation board can then pass the information on to the victim to enable the victim to make representations or simply be advised of the discharge and conditions, if they so wish.

For each of the three powers in the 1983 Act, there are two sets of provisions. The first enables the identified victim to make representations about the conditions of the offender's discharge through the local probation board and requires the local probation board to inform the victim whether any conditions will apply in the event of the offender's discharge. The local probation board must also advise about the end of restrictions on the offender and give any other appropriate information. In turn, both the Home Secretary and the mental health review tribunal are required to give the local probation board the information on discharges to enable the victim to be kept informed.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Minister will recollect that one of the problems when we discussed the matter in Committee was the extent to which information can properly be provided to victims about the mental health condition of somebody who might be released. An improvement in a person's mental condition often leads to release to taking place, and it is not clear from what the Minister has said how information will be provided in practice. Is it not the case that a person's medical condition is confidential between that person and those who treat them? How will the Government reconcile providing information with respecting patient confidentiality?

Paul Goggins: Patient confidentiality clearly raises some issues, but conditions can be laid down in relation to a particular offender when they are released from prison or hospital. A line must be drawn, but the provisions that we are introducing today make it clear that victims can be kept informed, where that is their wish, about whether the offender is released from hospital or prison. Although the provisions are complex and lengthy, I am convinced that they give us the cover that we need.

The second set of provisions requires the local probation board to keep the victim informed of decisions on discharge, and the Home Secretary and the mental health review tribunal to provide the board with the information that it needs to meet that requirement.

The remainder of the amendments are technical changes to clauses 36 to 40, to effect the structure.

Mr. Grieve: I do not want to take up the House's time. I am grateful to the Under-Secretary for taking on board the point that emerged in Committee that victims need to be kept informed about the release of patients who may be subject to restrictions under the Mental Health Act 1983. I hope that he will forgive me if I emphasise that the rules are complicated; I trust that they will achieve the desired effect. I have no reason from reading them to believe that they will not.

At the risk of repeating of myself, there is an issue about the amount of information that can be provided. I want to highlight the point so that it is placed on the record. It is clear that, in many cases, the release of someone who may have committed a violent offence may be intimately linked to the extent of the improvement of their mental condition while under treatment in hospital. Yet difficult ethical issues surround the amount of information and reassurance that can be provided to a victim about the offender's mental condition. I do not know how that will be resolved in practice. I do not know whether guidelines will be issued about the amount of information that can be supplied.

I can envisage a position whereby those who treat a patient, who is subject to restriction, in a mental hospital or psychiatric unit will feel constrained about what they can properly say without breaching patient confidentiality. That is not to diminish what the Government are trying to do, but I wonder whether it will prove problematic in practice. I assume that a victim can be given only the barest information that someone is due to be released and that the authorities are satisfied that that person does not currently pose a risk. The victim will inevitably ask, "Why do you believe that?" With the release of an ordinary prisoner, it might be possible to provide more information, but in the case that we are considering, there may be some problems with giving the information that people want. That is a problem for the Under-Secretary and it will be interesting to observe how the provisions work in practice. Subject to those comments, I welcome the amendments.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I also welcome the proposals' intent. I share with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) the view that there may be difficulties in implementation. Obviously, when conditions attach to an individual's release, specific information can be given to the victim. Indeed, new clause 13 lists such information. There is an ancillary matter, which is associated with the point that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield made, about medical assessments of the perpetrator's current mental condition. That is more difficult to define.

Are there any restrictions on the victim's use of information? In some circumstances, victims may wish to go to the local press and media and broadcast the fact that the person who caused them or their family a great deal of grief and anguish is to be released and is in the vicinity. It is an understandable reaction and, whatever conditions apply, they may believe that they have a story to tell. It may be published and that could pose difficulties for the offender's rehabilitation. One can foresee great difficulties only too easily.

However, if the information is given on restricted terms—I am not clear from the amendments that that is the case—further questions arise about the extent to which the information can be shared with, for example, Victim Support, which might be a helpful organisation in the circumstances; a local general practitioner; anyone who might want to provide counselling to the victim; or the local police, who were not directly involved in the case but have a locus standi.

We have important concerns about the operation of the proposals but we do not oppose the intent, which is clearly right.

Paul Goggins: The provisions do not allow for the disclosure of personal medical information or specific information about an individual's mental health. They ensure that the victim has the right to make representations about the conditions that will apply when the offender is released. They can be given simple factual information, namely, that the individual has been released from hospital or prison and the details of any prohibitions on contact.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) asked about restrictions on the use of the information. I need to check that and I shall contact him later. I understand that there are no strict legal limits, although it is good sense that people do not share the information. The point of providing it is to reduce rather than accelerate anxiety. If the information is passed to the media, it can serve only to heighten anxiety. That is not in the victim's interest. Of course, it would be useful if a victim could disclose the information to Victim Support and get some additional support. I shall examine the hon. Gentleman's point. As far as I can tell at this stage, there are no strictly enforced legal limitations, but common sense dictates that the closer the information is kept, the better.

Question put and agreed to.

Any payments will be subject to such conditions as he considers appropriate.'.

Mr. Dawson: First, I should like to acknowledge the work of Women's Aid Federation of England, which campaigned assiduously on contact in relation to domestic violence. I want to acknowledge its work in helping to develop the worthy amendments and new clauses.

I make no apology for returning to this issue, which I raised on Second Reading and in Committee. Everyone should acknowledge that, in recent years, at least 28 children have been murdered by their fathers during the course of contact visits, and we really should not leave the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill without fundamentally addressing that issue by changing its provisions.

1.30 pm

I am surprised that I have to move an amendment such as this again. The Government have expressed their determination to make contact safer, and I do not think that anyone would doubt their determination for an instant. The Opposition—who I understand are now set on a policy of equal parenting, although I am not quite sure what that means—have also assured us, during the passage of the Children Bill, that they do not intend to put children at risk in any way. One would hope that there would be complete agreement among the 659 Members of Parliament on this issue. At least the Government acknowledge that there is a problem in this regard, but I am worried that some of the key issues have not been addressed, especially in Committee, and that the significance and seriousness of the problem seemed to be skirted over.

Since Committee, we have seen the publication of the Green Paper, "Parental Separation: Children's Needs and Parents' Responsibilities". Paragraph 47 of the Green Paper rightly acknowledges that the Court of Appeal has generally approved guidelines developed by the Children Act sub-committee to ensure that,

> "where domestic violence is alleged, the courts must make a finding of fact as to whether or not the alleged violence has occurred and, if it has, what impact it has had on the child."

It goes on to say:

> "Any harm to the child as a result of the violence must be taken into account in the decision on contact and what kind of arrangements should be put in place to ensure that it is safe."

That is all well and good, and it relates to the discussions that we have had throughout the passage of the Bill, but unfortunately, paragraph 48 of the Green Paper goes on to report that

> "the implementation of these guidelines has been patchy."

I am sorry to say that that statement contradicts the assurances that we were given by the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), that the principle was robust and would provide the assurance that hon. Members required. I was not reassured in Committee, and no one who reads the Green Paper will be reassured. The Government do not believe that we have a proper system in place at the moment.

That word "patchy" is one of the most grotesque understatements ever to be put before the House. It refers not to the failure of certain judges to observe some arcane guideline or dusty element or principle in the further reaches of the law, but to the colossal failure of some judges in our family justice system to protect children. We all know what happens to the most junior social workers who make colossal errors of judgment and fail to prevent children from being murdered. We know what happened to the social worker in the Victoria Climbié case, for example. She was sacked, vilified and pilloried, and her life—or certainly, her career—has been ruined.

But what of the judge who ignores guidelines and orders unsupervised contact with schedule 1 offenders? That was recently reported by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to be happening on a large scale. What of the judge who puts a belief in the virtues of contact ahead of the paramountcy principle embodied in the Children Act 1989? What of the judge who considers that there should be a higher standard of proof where there are allegations of the sexual abuse of children? What exactly should we do when children are murdered during the unsupervised contact ordered by a judge? Are those distinguished gentlemen—they are almost invariably gentlemen—even asked to contribute to the part 8 review? Who questions their judgment when they get it wrong?

The Government have responded to what they regard as an inadequate situation by, finally, proposing to bring into law by January 2005 section 120 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which amends the definition of significant "harm" to include the witnessing of domestic violence. That is important; it constitutes a vital protective step. The only other thing that we have been promised, however, are robust monitoring arrangements. As I have said in regard to the Children Act sub-committee guidelines, what we have had so far has not been good enough, and has been acknowledged by the Government to be inadequate. We need to make significant changes to the Bill before Parliament can be satisfied that we really are starting to protect children in these most difficult and, in some cases, dangerous circumstances.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman will recollect that he raised this matter in Committee. At that time, it was my impression that he might have had the support of a majority in Committee for his point of view. However, he did not put the matter to the vote. I wonder whether that was because he had received an assurance from the Government, which has not yet been honoured. Is that why he has had to bring the matter back on Report? What is his reason for returning to it now, given that he did not take the opportunity to press it to a vote in Committee?

Mr. Dawson: I regret to inform the hon. Gentleman that I did not have the majority of the Committee on my side. That was made very plain to me during that memorable afternoon. Would that I had.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I am quite surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that. I was flabbergasted that he did not take the opportunity to press the matter to a vote in Committee because, between those Members on our side and those on his side who had spoken to the amendment, we had a majority. I was therefore very surprised to see him duck the opportunity.

Mr. Dawson: I think that the hon. Lady is talking about a different amendment. The one about which she was most critical of me related to part 8 reviews and domestic homicide reviews. I can assure her that I am telling her the truth on this matter. My hon. Friends in the Whips Office know that I have voted against the Government on occasion.

Lords Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury (Mr. John Heppell): If my hon. Friend could have won the vote, he would have voted.

Mr. Dawson: I think we must respect the sedentary intervention of my hon. Friend.

I hope that we can move forward on these amendments today. The Government tell us that the paramountcy principle outweighs current case law, to which I have referred and which, frankly, does not protect children. I do not trust that case law, which seems to operate against the best interests of children. I honestly do not trust judges to listen properly to children who have experienced abuse. That is hardly a criticism that can be made solely of the judicial profession, but it is very clearly the case.

[Mr. Dawson]

Women's Aid has been assiduous in bringing forward young people and putting them into contact with parliamentarians, who are outraged that those young people's voices have not been listened to, and that they or their younger brothers and sisters have been placed in considerable danger and acute risk by the decisions of adults who have not listened to their very real concerns. We shall not get any further forward in this regard without the implementation of section 122 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which would ensure the separate representation of children in private law. This would ensure that the interests of children would be properly promoted in the family courts.

Of course these decisions are some of the most difficult that anyone in public life could ever be called upon to make, and of course honest mistakes will be made, but surely we should work on the principle that it is a child's right to have contact with both parents as long as it is in the child's best interests. I am quite sure, however, that the only way for Parliament to insist that the right of children to be safeguarded is upheld is to pass new clause 1, which promotes the safety of children in contact hearings where domestic violence has been alleged and to support new clause 2, which sets out a helpful checklist to assist courts in that task.

Those amendments support the paramount principle of the Children Act 1989, that decisions should be made in the best interests of the child, and if the Opposition are serious about equal parenting, the amendments are a vital safeguard that they should incorporate in any such approach. Every single Member of the House will be concerned about this issue; every single member of the House should support the amendments.

Mr. Grieve: As I think the hon. Gentleman is aware, I have considerable sympathy for the intention behind his amendments, which we also had a chance to look at in Committee. We fully accept that the need to protect children from violence, including violence from one or other parent, is a very important matter. We are also aware of the risk—we know of such incidents—of children being exposed to possible violence during contact with a non-resident parent. I know that that is a matter of particular concern to the hon. Gentleman. I believe that he may be involved with the passage of the Children Bill, and I should like to offer him some reassurance. The hon. Gentleman is correct that we advocate equal parenting and are in favour of the principle that the normal place of residence of a child is with its parents when living together—a principle to which I think he would not take exception. We also believe that in the event of parental separation, every opportunity should be given to competent and caring parents who are non-resident to provide an input into their child's upbringing. However, we are not seeking to undermine in any way the anxieties that he has expressed in the particular context of the amendments.

The question does arise—I suppose it will arise also on equal parenting but I think it arises more in this context—about whether the framework of proposals that the hon. Gentleman has put forward are necessary to ensure that the court has proper regard to possible abusive relationships within the family unit of the person seeking contact. My own experience of doing family legal work, admittedly mostly before the enactment of the Children Act 1989, is that such considerations were very much at the forefront of any decisions that were taken about whether contact should be allowed or residence altered. The checklist that the hon. Gentleman has provided in new clause 2 is the sort of checklist that I would expect the court to go through anyway.

Mr. Dawson indicated assent.

Mr. Grieve: I am glad to see that hon. Gentleman agrees. Although I do have sympathy with the thrust of his amendments, I shall wait with interest to hear from the Minister whether he thinks that their incorporation is a necessity, because, as I think I made clear to him earlier, in my opinion the Children Act as currently drafted does already provide that those issues should be addressed. We also have to bear in mind—I am sure that the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) will agree about this as well—that it is an unfortunate feature of many a marriage or relationship break-up that false accusations of abusive behaviour are used by one party or another as a form of leverage in order to try to deny the other party contact or residence with the child. Of course, I accept that the terms of the amendments tabled by the hon. Gentleman would not prevent the court from considering that possibility.

1.45 pm

I wonder whether I might now discuss new clause 10, which stands in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and myself and of the Liberal Democrats? It seeks to address the specific issue of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is referring to amendment No. 10. We have already debated new clause 10.

Mr. Grieve: I do apologise. I was indeed referring to amendment No. 10. For a moment, I thought I was completely out of order and was seeking to refer to something to which I could not make reference. That has been known to happen. I am grateful for the correction, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Amendment No. 10 relates to a person causing or allowing the death of a child or a vulnerable adult. The Minister will recollect that there was considerable debate on this matter in Committee. The Government have set on a perfectly good course of seeking to deal with the problem that arises where two people are charged with murder and it is clear that one or other of them must have done it but completely unclear as to which one. In those circumstances we have had instances where the two carers or parents involved have been acquitted because it has been impossible to tell who was responsible. Clause 5 attempts to deal with that by creating a new offence where a child or vulnerable adult dies as a result of the unlawful act of a person who was a member of the same household and had frequent contact with him.

We are not opposed to that clause. We do, however, have concerns, as the Minister knows, about how it will operate, because one of the effective consequences of the clause is a degree of reversal of the burden of evidential proof, because it effectively compels people to give evidence against each other or to face the consequences of their silence.

The amendment that we have tabled on Report deals specifically with the issue of those who may have been subject to domestic violence, because it is quite clear from recorded cases that there may well be instances where a person has acquiesced in violence being perpetrated against a child in the household because they themselves are in fear of violence, and we do not feel that clause 5 as currently drafted has sufficient regard to that contingency.

We are seeking to insert after clause 5(1)(d)(ii) a requirement that, where a person has frequent contact with the child, in determining the reasonableness of the steps which the defendant could have been expected to take, the court should "have particular regard to the extent to which" the defendant

"has been subjected to domestic violence or is in fear of being subjected to domestic violence", because it must be the case that where someone has been in fear of violence or subjected to violence, they will be in a much less favourable position to take effective steps to protect the child from the risk. It is that point which we think the court should have very much in mind when the time comes to direct a jury, at the end of a jury trial, in respect of such matters.

I concede that it is already possible that that could happen because a judge may do it of his own motion. But although a judge may do it of his own motion, if Parliament thinks that it is a matter of sufficient importance that we should highlight it, I do think that there is a very good argument for including it in the Bill.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): Is the hon. Gentleman not concerned that if we include this caveat, defendants might seek to claim domestic violence to escape from the seriousness of what has happened, when, in effect, the introduction of this offence is intended to make people face up to the responsibility of having been involved in or having caused the death of a child?

Mr. Grieve: I understand the hon. Lady's point, but I do not think that that is a particular risk. It is the sort of assertion that may be made in any event and it will not contribute to people deciding to assert it more frequently. The question that we must ask is: in cases of serious domestic violence that may be perpetrated against one person by their partner, are they in as good a position as others to fulfil the legal obligations that we place on them in relation to the offence that we create in clause 5? I would have thought that the hon. Lady would have no difficulty in agreeing that such a person, because of their vulnerability, would be poorly placed to provide protection to a child who was also suffering abusive behaviour and domestic violence from their partner. That may be a matter for mitigation of sentence at the end of the court case. But the question arises: should it also provide a possible defence?

We are creating a very unusual offence—an offence of negligence that places specific burdens on an individual. If that individual does not discharge those obligations, and even if they are not the person who was responsible for the injuries, they are still guilty of an extremely serious offence for which they can go to prison for a very long time. I look to the Minister to give the House his views on the matter.

Mr. Dawson: Does hon. Gentleman feel that the Bill as it stands reflects the seriousness with which people should rightly regard child abuse, and does he believe that it is important that people should not be given any opportunity to excuse their complicity in child abuse? Surely, there should be a spur to a woman to help herself out of a violent situation if she felt that a child was being hurt as well.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, but it is worth bearing in mind the nature of this offence, which is punishable by a period of imprisonment of up to 14 years—it is not a slight matter, it is extremely serious—and which can be committed by an individual without their having done any positive act of violence whatever against the child in the family. That is a fairly unusual state of affairs and it is a very unusual offence under our laws.

I understand why the Government have introduced the offence, but it is worth bearing in mind whether it will act fairly, as it has the potential to be used to send people to prison for an extremely long time, when there may be doubt—or it may ultimately become clear—that they were not responsible for the injuries sustained by the child, which may or may not have caused death. In those circumstances, is it right that we should convict a person if it becomes clear that that person was the subject of serious domestic violence during the period when their alleged negligence—that is what it amounts to—took place, which was possibly meted out from exactly the same source as the violence being perpetrated on the child and that led to its death? That is the issue.

I would feel more comfortable were amendment No. 10 accepted because I do not think that it undermines the intention behind the offence in clause 5. It provides a proper safeguard, however, against what are often tragic situations.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I want to return to the new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). I have tabled terribly similar clauses, which are as close to his as makes no difference, although I am grateful to the Table Office for noticing the difference.

I, too, want to pay tribute to Women's Aid. I cannot imagine that anyone in the Chamber who considered the Bill in Committee and who has an interest in the hugely important question of domestic violence does not appreciate the number of years and the amount of effort that Women's Aid has contributed to ensure that we, for example, are concentrating on this issue today. Without its determination and campaigning record, we would not have focused on the issue as strongly. It has done an extremely good job and I owe much of what I will say on various amendments this afternoon to its work.

The difficulty with contact and domestic violence can best be summed up simply in some figures. In 2002, there were 61,356 contact orders, and contact was refused in only 518 cases; in only 0.8 per cent. of all cases. Notwithstanding that, the family court welfare service says that it is dealing with about 16,000 disputed contact cases a year in which domestic violence is an issue. In some recent research, the Department for Constitutional Affairs has found that allegations of domestic violence feature in 23 per cent. of contact and residence cases.

I appreciate and respect the welfare principle, but those on the ground are satisfied that society at large is still at the slightly curious stage—curious to those who are very acquainted with the issue of domestic violence—at which truly domestic violence is not given the priority that it ought to have, because, to some extent, it is still an emerging issue. Although it is now known that it exists, and the figures are bruited around, its impact on individuals, particularly on children, is not yet appreciated to the fullest extent. That must be right; given the figures that I have just mentioned, it sounds as if a disproportionate amount of contact is being granted in cases in which there is undoubtedly at least an allegation of domestic violence. In 16,000 cases, however, the family court welfare service says that domestic violence is involved, which seems to go beyond allegations. One is therefore very concerned that the welfare principle is not safeguarding children when domestic violence is on the scene. Once I have set that out, it is clear that these new clauses and amendments are important, at least in testing how the Minister's thinking has moved on since Committee.

The welfare principle, of course, is open to a multitude of interpretations. If one has a strong, old-fashioned view—such views take a long time to die—that what is absolutely paramount for the welfare of a child is that it should be kept in touch with both its parents, almost come what may, that is one's interpretation of the welfare principle; one will give too much precedence and too much priority, in the light of what we know about domestic violence, to ensuring that that occurs. One will devalue contraindications of that.

That is a huge worry, and I have strong concerns, based on a certain amount of experience, that the judiciary—not all of its members, by any means, but some, particularly older members—has a fixed view as to the importance of fathers in families. Nobody gainsays that, but it is allowed to take precedence over examining more closely and thoroughly the impact on children of what domestic violence has taken place; they must find out that it has taken place to act on it. The same clauses and check lists have therefore been tabled again to say to the Minister that, on the figures that I have put forward, the welfare principle does not seem to be enough, and to ask what more we should be doing.

It is a good thing that section 120 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 requires the courts to take into account the fact that children have witnessed abuse. That is important and puts the issue of domestic violence well up the agenda. Another fact that cannot be overlooked is the impact of the new court application forms that the Government introduced after the Act came into force. The form contains specific and fairly detailed questions about allegations of domestic violence so that the allegations are drawn out and the issue identified at the outset and dealt with.

I do not see any real difficulty with that, but I should be grateful for the Minister's comments. The court is happy to introduce a new series of application form questions that intend to draw out information on domestic violence, and that is a good thing. That requires the court to be aware of domestic violence and to think through its extent, depth and gravity. It also requires the court to focus some thought on how to deal with the existence of domestic violence. Given that such requirements are already on the application form, I do not see any difficulty with including the mandatory risk assessment checklist in, at the very least, guidance to judges. It is slightly rum—if I may put it that way—to have a form on which specific questions about domestic violence are set out and then not to give judges any guidance at all about how they are supposed to weigh in the balance, evaluate and put strength on the allegations that emerge.

Guidelines, such as those in new clause 2, would be very helpful. The definition of the welfare principle is wide. However, there are other aspects of the law in which judges would say that wide definitions that give them open discretion have been closed down to them only in the sense that they have been required to take a fixed set of steps in coming to their conclusion. In effect, their discretion has been guided, and I suggest that that should be the position here. Empirical evidence in many cases in which issues of domestic violence have been raised but have resulted in contact shows that the welfare principle on its own will not do. We have to set out the steps that the judiciary needs to take to satisfy ourselves that the issue of domestic violence is being given the importance that it should have.

Research that I recently read from Professor Sylvia Walby concluded that previous domestic assault is now identified > "as the simplest, most robust risk marker of subsequent domestic assault."

Let us get well away from the idea that domestic violence stops when the parties separate; it does not. If it has been present before, it is, on that analysis, likely to be present again and therefore is a factor to which the judge should give lively consideration when deciding when to allow contact.

My name is attached to a number of the amendments in the group, but I shall not spend a huge amount of time on amendment No. 64, because we discussed it in Committee. The amendment requires the Secretary of State to give himself the ability to give grants to voluntary organisations for the purposes of providing protection and support services for children who suffered from seeing the ill treatment of a parent. Despite the fact that two thirds of the children resident in refuges have either seen or been the victims of domestic violence, no funding at all is provided for paid staff to work specifically with those children.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre quoted Children's Voices in Committee, and I quoted Women's Aid. The children said how sad they had been because they had no one to talk to about the issues and, I am afraid, the position remains the same. I therefore invite my hon. Friend the Minister again to respond to the question of what we do about children who have undoubtedly suffered and for whom no resources of conversation, counselling and support are available.

Another amendments deal with the new offence relating to killing a child, mentioned by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). I support the new offence completely. Indeed, I have done my best to drive it forward having, with others, tabled a new clause to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 to try to deal with the terrible situation in which three children under the age of 10 are killed each week by carers. In some cases, it is perfectly plain that one or other of the two carers on trial is responsible but it impossible under the current rules of jurisprudence to ascertain which. I am strongly in favour of creating the new offence, but I want to prompt my hon. Friend the Minister to comment on the dire situation of women who suffer from domestic violence. What can he do to help with such problems?

On the death of a child, it is likely that a woman who experienced domestic violence will be charged along with its perpetrator. That will probably take place on the basis that the woman failed to protect the child, but it is well known that it is difficult for women to talk readily about domestic violence. It is also well known that when there is domestic violence, there is almost always sexual violence. It is even harder for people to talk about that. It is extraordinary difficult to expect women to talk readily about sexual violence when they are interviewed by police officers in the immediate aftermath of the death of one of their children. Such women are bound to be traumatised again, well beyond anything that the domestic violence has inflicted on them.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I have dealt with many cases in which women have killed their violent partner. In early interviews to the police, those women did not disclose the extent of the domestic violence, let alone the sexual abuse, to which they were subject. However, over time and after talking to a sympathetic psychologist, psychiatrist or even solicitor, they have started to be able to talk about it. Once somebody is charged and interviewed, or interviewed and charged—whichever way round it comes—the process to court follows reasonably quickly. I do not think it right to put in place a defence for people who have suffered domestic violence, because there is probably already a defence in jurisprudence for people who have been unable to stop themselves from committing a crime because they were under duress.

Domestic violence would constitute duress in many cases, so I do not see the need for such an offence. However, within the sculpture of what has rightly been referred to as a very unusual offence in which the burden of proof is rightly reversed, there must be critical thinking as to what we will do to get women to talk about domestic violence and sexual abuse and accept that they were unable to resist what their partner had done to them and their children. The experience of lawyers like me shows that such proceedings can involve a slow process, but we must consider what special resources can be provided to ensure that, in every case in which domestic violence could be a factor, information on it is drawn out from the person involved. With the reversal of the burden of proof pretty well in place, the real danger is that, unless proper resources are provided to draw the information out, people might be wrongly convicted.

Following a conviction when the burden of proof is, as it were, the usual way round, a body such as Women's Aid or Justice for Women will get a pretty salty reaction from the Court of Appeal if they say, "But over the period since this woman was convicted—in fact this began to emerge during the trial, but not very fully—she has been able to tell us exactly how bad the domestic violence was, and exactly how incapacitated by it she was." The Court of Appeal tends to think that the woman was telling the truth in the original interviews, and has lied since.

Mr. Grieve: I agree with the hon. and learned Lady. In such circumstances, is it not all the more desirable for us to make plain in the Bill that the issue needs attention? If we do not, there is precisely the risk that the truth will only emerge subsequently, and will not be dealt with properly at trial.

Vera Baird: I do not deny that the hon. Gentleman has a point. My amendment is intended to add weight to it. The hon. Gentleman knows, however, that judges tend to see what is in statute as being more important that any other possible factor. That is what makes me shrink from naming domestic violence specifically; other factors may have equal potency for one or other of the parties. Nevertheless, it scares me stiff—I put it as bluntly as that—that if special resources are not put into cases of this kind, women who have done nothing other than suffer from domestic violence will be convicted. I invite my hon. Friend the Minister to tell us what he thinks he can do.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). My party and I agree with many things that they said. I only wish that Ministers listened more attentively to the views of people with real experience, who have a cogent story to tell.

I tabled a number of the new clauses and amendments in this group. New clause 5 deals with the important issue of recovery orders. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) has been required for parliamentary duties elsewhere, but I know he would have been delighted to speak about a matter that he has pursued personally for some time, a matter that is of great importance to many of those who have informed our debate from outside. Women's Aid in particular is very concerned about the way in which the recovery order provisions currently work.

I think I should put on record the circumstances of what is probably the most tragic case of its kind, the case that occasioned my hon. Friend's interest. In 1997 Georgina McCarthy and her son, then aged one, fled to the Penzance branch of Women's Aid following domestic violence at her home. Her husband, Paul Russell, then used section 33 of the Family Law Act 1986 to apply for information on the child's whereabouts. In that instance Georgina McCarthy's solicitor managed to prevent the address of the refuge from being revealed, but later Georgina was warned that her husband was coming to Penzance to find her. She knew that if she moved elsewhere, section 33 would again be used by her husband to enable her whereabouts to be disclosed; so she decided that moving was pointless. At least in Penzance she had contact with the police, Women's Aid, her solicitor and her barrister. Tragically, it was the wrong decision. On 9 May 1988, her husband found her and killed her in front of the child.

2.15 pm

That is an extreme case, but it is not unique. There is evidence of abuse of the recovery order process by those wishing to discover the whereabouts of mothers who have fled abuse, and who are then wrongly accused of child abduction by their abusing partners. I do not accept the Government's response in the other place and in Committee that arrangements in the courts were sufficient to meet the need as it stands, and that no further amendment was required. Evidence suggests that, although they may be rare, there are instances of courts being prepared to entertain applications of that kind, and indeed to allow the disclosure of addresses.

That puts at risk the whole principle of women's refuges, which is a serious matter and one that the Government should address more seriously than they have so far. I hope that, even at this late stage, they will review the use of recovery orders and establish whether an accommodation can be reached, allowing them to make plain what they seem to assume is implicitly the case; that when abuse is involved, the whereabouts of a mother and child will not be given by means of that process.

My amendments Nos. 12, 13, 14 and 15 deal with the circumstances of the new offence. As the Minister knows, I welcome the creation of the offence. I was one of the Members who urged the implementation of the Law Commission's proposals at the outset, because I felt that joint enterprise in familial homicide involved serious issues. My amendments would reinstate the Law Commission's recommendation that the law should cover not just death, but serious harm. I have not yet heard a strong enough argument—other than the argument that the offence is new and we must see how it works before extending it—for differentiating between serious harm caused to a child by two perpetrators, neither of whom can be identified clearly for the purpose of prosecution, and the death of a child.

I seem to remember the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) making a cogent point in Committee. I believe he said that grievous bodily harm was murder without a body. Are we really to countenance circumstances in which a child is seriously injured—perhaps put into a coma, or suffering major loss of a faculty—by abusive parents, and there is no prosecution? I find it difficult to differentiate between the circumstances of familial homicide and those of that sort of abuse.

The Law Commission recommended the insertion of these words, and they were in the draft Bill. The Government have now left them out, but I still see a strong argument for their inclusion. I understand, of course, that if the Bill were enacted the operation of the offence would need to be carefully reviewed, but it can be reviewed as carefully in the context of its value or otherwise in cases of serious harm as it can in cases of culpable homicide.

My amendment No. 1 deals with a potential lacuna; the failure to include those under 16 in respect of whom a serious case review has not been undertaken, and who will not qualify for a domestic homicide review specified to be for those aged 16 or over. We discussed that in Committee, so I do not propose to spend any longer on it now.

I shall finish by considering amendment No. 10, to which the hon. Member for Beaconsfield and his colleagues have added their names, and which started off in the House of Lords as a joint enterprise between our two parties. The Government removed the amendment in Committee, which was a huge mistake. The comments of the hon. and learned Member for Redcar underline the difficulties involved in dealing with such cases. I do not accept the argument that the amendment is an invitation to a defence that is also in fact an invitation to commit the crime. Rather, it is an invitation to consider mitigation, and there is a clear differentiation to be made in that regard. There is abundant evidence that a court will not necessarily take such factors into consideration because of the circumstances, and because of the difficulties that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar described.

Those in another place who passed this amendment and have seen it removed in this House will return to this issue, and they will be right to do so. We in this House should indicate that we are not prepared to see someone who is a victim made doubly a victim by being prosecuted inappropriately for an action that they were unable to resist because of the abuse that they were suffering in the home. However, that is what will happen if we do not pass amendment No. 10 today, so I want to make it plain that it is my wish, if at all possible, to press it to a Division; unless, of course, the Minister is happy to accept it. We in this House need to send a signal to those who will consider the Bill after us that they were right and the Government are wrong.

Paul Goggins: I begin my response to what has been a wide-ranging discussion over a fairly short time by acknowledging the deep commitment and experience of many Members in respect of these issues, which is reflected in the amendments that they tabled.

I pay tribute to Women's Aid and to the other organisations that have helped to inform our discussions today and in Committee. I should gently say to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that of course Front Benchers have listened to such organisations; it would be a foolish Government who did not listen to organisations that are in daily contact with those who are at the sharp end of such matters.

The Government are committed to facilitating contact between the child and the non-resident parent where that is in the best interests of the child, and where doing so is safe for the child and for all family members. I know from today's discussion and earlier ones that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) in particular hold very strong views on this issue, as well as considerable experience. I hope that they will forgive me if I tell them that the Government's position remains the same as during our earlier discussions.

The Government are not trying to be deliberately awkward or difficult. Section 1 of the Children Act 1989, which requires courts to treat the welfare of the child as the paramount consideration in making any decision about their upbringing, is central to our policy. We consider that to be the right principle, and we do not want it to be diluted in any way. Of course, we want that principle to work in practice, and we must continue to monitor what happens and to make the necessary improvements. I am grateful for the comments that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar made about the improvements that we are achieving.

The new forms, which will be in use from January 2005, will ensure that courts are aware of any allegations of domestic violence from the start of a case's consideration. The commencement at the same time of section 120 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 will strengthen the definition of harm, so that harm caused to a child by their seeing or hearing violence towards another will also be considered. In other words, not only direct violence to the child but violence witnessed by the child will be taken into account. Crucially, the courts will decide whether domestic violence has occurred before making orders on contact and residence.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar asked what more we can do, and it is clear that we need to do whatever is required. She is right: we need to train the judiciary and to continue to ensure that attitudes change. We will continue to monitor the situation and we will, of course, consider further evidence from Members of Parliament and voluntary organisations, but the core of our policy is the belief that it is not the Government's job, in enacting legislation, to choose between parents: rather, our job is to place the best interests of the child at the heart of our policies.

Mr. Dawson: I am mystified by the constant recourse to the paramountcy principle. I firmly believe that everything that I have advocated this afternoon is entirely in line with, and supports, the paramountcy principle, and that it gives good guidance to the courts in order to ensure that they consider the best interests of the child.

Paul Goggins: What we need in legislation is absolute clarity about our starting point in policy, which has to be the best interests of the child. We believe that if we start from there, and if we adopt from next January the rigorously enforced and improving system that I outlined, in conjunction with the new procedures that we are putting in place, the protection of children will be enhanced and increased, but I repeat that we need to make it clear in legislation that our starting point is the welfare and best interests of the child.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome mentioned recovery orders. Before a recovery order can be made, there must be a part 1 order. If either party is worried that the provisions of the part 1 order are no longer relevant—there might be new evidence or new concerns—they can return to the court and seek a variation of the contact or residence order if, for example, they have concerns about domestic violence, or if evidence of an offence has emerged. That would have to be done through a variation of the part 1 order. I should impress on the hon. Gentleman, who brought to our attention a deeply tragic case, that parties are not required to disclose their addresses to the court. That is an important protection, particularly for those who feel vulnerable.

I turn to familial homicide, about which a number of Members spoke, and to amendments Nos. 12, 13, 14 and 15. They reflect the real determination, which is shared throughout the House, to do everything we can to solve the so-called "Which of you did it?" cases without unduly penalising those who have themselves suffered domestic violence. The issue is: how do we get the balance right? The question of whether the offence should be extended to cover not only death but serious harm—

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): Will the Minister clarify his point about people not being expected, or legally required, to give their address in court? In some instances, judges have forced people to give names and addresses in open court, so I am slightly bewildered by his comment.

Paul Goggins: I am happy to say again that parties are not required to disclose their addresses to the court, and I am perfectly happy to put that in writing to the hon. Gentleman if it will help to clarify matters.

Vera Baird: The courts must surely have such people's names and addresses; the issue is whether they are given to other parties.

Paul Goggins: I apologise if there has been some slight confusion. The judge will of course have such information; the question is how that information is then handled, and it certainly should not be made public. I hope that explanation helps the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock).

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome argued consistently in Committee and today for the offence of familial homicide to be extended to cover not only death but serious harm. The borderline between death and serious injury can of course sometimes be a narrow one.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not feel that I am trying to string him along when I say that I would not want completely to rule out extending the offence at a later stage. At this stage, however, as we begin to put the new offence in place, there are major arguments in favour of restricting the offence to death.

2.30 pm

First, defining the term "serious harm" is not without potential difficulties, whereas death provides a clear and fairly unarguable parameter for the offence. Death is rightly dealt with more seriously than other injuries under our law, and the Law Commission's proposals acknowledge that. In cases involving children, it is possible to bring charges of child cruelty or neglect under section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. I point out to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) that the offence includes neglect as well as positive action to bring about cruelty or harm. The more serious cases where death has occurred require a different charge and a stronger penalty.

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate the Minister's point. He refers to old and established law, but the fact is that the maximum penalty for that offence is entirely different from what we are imposing in respect of the new offence under the clause.

Paul Goggins: Indeed, and that reflects our concern about death and the fact that someone has taken an action that has resulted in someone's death. That requires the most severe penalties from the courts, which is why I argue that we need to have the more serious offence in place, without ruling out the possibility that we may eventually extend it, but not now. We need to get the new offence working in our legislative system.

The problem of working out who committed the offence is less likely to be a problem where the victim has been injured but survived. The victim might be in a position to give evidence about who caused the injury. Other witnesses within the household might come forward to protect the victim from future harm. Both those arguments make for a different situation: the victim is still about, requiring and receiving the protection of others within the household.

Mr. Heath: I hear what the Minister says about the review being ongoing and I note his willingness to return to the matter at a later stage. I gave the examples of a child who is rendered comatose or incapable of communication by an act of violence inflicted by one or two partners and of a baby who cannot give evidence in court. Would those partners be prosecutable under the offence as it stands? I have already argued that I believe that they should be.

Paul Goggins: I simply say to the hon. Gentleman that his examples are compelling, which is why I do not rule out extending the offence at some time in the future. It is important, first, to put in place the new offence. Let us get that right first and see how the provision operates. If appropriate, we may return to the problem at a later date.

We agree about the need to protect the victims of domestic violence and we are sympathetic to the concerns that lie behind amendments Nos. 10 and 61, but it is important to be clear, as I tried to explain in Committee, that however dreadful the experience of being a victim of domestic violence, people are not absolved from the responsibility to do what they can to protect a child or vulnerable person who is depending on them for help.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister touches on an important issue. Under clause 5(1)(d)(ii), the accusation relates to the failure "to take such steps as he reasonably could have been expected to take to protect" the victim from "risk". What is regarded as being "reasonable" in that context, and to what extent is reasonableness affected by the circumstances in which individuals find themselves? Surely the whole point of the amendment is to highlight that what is reasonable for a person who is suffering from domestic violence is likely to be different than for someone who is not.

Paul Goggins: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman highlights clause 5(1)(d)(ii), as I was just about to go on to precisely that provision. A person will not be guilty of an offence unless they have failed to take such steps as they could, in their circumstances, reasonably be expected to take to protect the victim from risk. It is for the court to determine what that means; it is not a matter for Parliament to rule out. That is the key point. Including the provision in the Bill means that the courts will be able to take serious domestic violence into account. In many cases, I am sure that the court will take those circumstances into account, but in the end it is for the court rather than the House to decide.

The practical effect of the amendment would be seriously to undermine the reasonable steps test. It would make the offence less clear. Amendment No. 10, in particular, refers to someone who is but that could apply to a very large number of defendants. Furthermore, there are other vulnerable groups: there may be children or vulnerable elderly relatives in the household, so why should they not also be excluded? The reasonable steps provision is the best way to deal with the problem, rather than excluding one particular group, however sympathetic we are to them.

"in fear of being subjected to domestic violence",

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar spoke about the links between domestic violence and sexual violence. She is right to draw our attention to that, and I hope that she is reassured that the Government understand the connection. We are trying, off the back of the sexual offences legislation that we passed last year, to drive through a series of policies and initiatives. My hon. and learned Friend will know that we are developing a network of sexual assault referral centres, far more than were in existence when we debated the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The first £4 million from the victims fund will go to organisations that work on behalf of the victims of sexual offences. I hope that she appreciates—I know she does, as I often speak to her about these matters—how much is being done to deal with the connections that she spoke about.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome touched briefly on domestic homicide reviews and the particular case of children. He mentioned it briefly, so I shall respond briefly. Concern was expressed at some length in Committee and it is only right to put matters straight. The concern was that the deaths of children might not always be reviewed, especially when a child or family had not come into contact with social services before the injury or death.

I wrote to members of the Committee on 13 July and I say again today that amendment No. 1 is unnecessary because any death of someone aged under 16 that met the criteria for a domestic homicide review would already have to be the subject of a serious case review. Indeed, Government guidance published in 1999, entitled "Working Together to Safeguard Children", sets out the criteria for serious case reviews and makes it clear that agencies should always conduct a review where abuse and neglect are known or suspected to have been a factor in the death. That includes all cases where a family member has killed a child, even if there was no history of abuse and no contact with statutory agencies.

Mr. Heath: I mentioned the issue briefly because I hoped that the Minister would be able to satisfy me entirely on it, and he now has. However, he has not entirely satisfied me about amendment No. 10 and I still intend to press it to a Division, if possible.

Paul Goggins: Whether a glass is half full or half empty is a judgment that I suppose we all need to make. My final point to the hon. Gentleman on this matter is that under the new arrangements envisaged under the Children Bill, all unexpected child deaths will be investigated by local screening teams and wherever it appears that abuse or neglect may have played a part in the death the case will be referred to the local safeguarding children board for a serious case review. The Government are therefore confident that all unexpected deaths will be checked and, if necessary, reviewed so that no cases can fall through the net.

Finally, in connection with her amendment No. 64, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar spoke about the payment of grants to voluntary organisations supporting children who have suffered after witnessing the treatment of others. However, the purpose of clause 50, to which the amendment refers, is to provide statutory authority for regular Government grants to voluntary sector bodies, and that is consistent with Treasury best practice. The clause already provides that the Secretary of State may pay grants to any organisation that appears to him to assist victims, witnesses or other persons affected by offences. Children who have been affected by offences as set out in the amendment are definitely included in that definition, so it is unnecessary to mention them specifically on the face of the Bill. Of course, we will need to watch carefully and make sure that the right amount of money goes to the organisations involved.

Vera Baird: I am sorry to be slightly out of step, but my hon. Friend said that this was his final point and I want to take him back to the question of familial homicide. I am attracted to the idea of putting domestic violence on the face of the Bill because that would make all the parties in any case that might involve domestic violence aware that it is highly relevant. As a result, they will look for it. I appreciate that judges and juries will take domestic violence into account if its occurrence has been brought out into the open, as my hon. Friend said. However, as I noted earlier, women cannot talk about domestic violence or domestic sexual violence, except in very sympathetic circumstances. That is especially true in the aftermath of a trauma such as the death of a child, and such matters often do not come out in time for a trial.

I do not expect my hon. Friend the Minister to have a solution to that problem now, but I want him to think about it, as I do, because it is a real concern.

Paul Goggins: I do indeed think about these matters, as they are very important. My point is simply that it may be very relevant that domestic violence has occurred, in which case the court will take that into account. In resisting these amendments, we are saying that such violence cannot be used as an excuse always and in every case. My hon. and learned Friend is referring to those vulnerable individuals who will need support whether they are victims or witnesses, and that opens up a broader discussion about the criminal justice system as a whole. We are getting better at supporting people but we need to improve that, so that people in court are able to deal with, and speak about, these matters.

I just want to repeat my final point on the previous matter, which is that we will need to ensure that an appropriate amount of money goes to those organisations working with children.

In summary, I hope that it has been evident from what I have said that I sympathise completely with the motives behind some of the amendments under discussion. However, much of what they seek to achieve will be achieved by the Bill, although some of the amendments go further than what we feel can be justified as necessary. Therefore, I ask that the amendments be withdrawn.

Mr. Dawson: This has been a good debate, and I am grateful for the support extended by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) supported new clauses 1 and 2. I know that he is an experienced and extremely learned practitioner in the courts, but I sometimes think that he is a little too sanguine about how well they operate. In response to his concerns about whether these amendments are necessary, I simply refer him to some of the statistics quoted by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar, and to the abuse experienced by women and children on contact visits. I also point to the number of contact orders made on schedule 1 offenders, and to the horrendous fact that there have been 28 child deaths in recent years.

Reference was made to the question of false allegations. Public inquiries into child deaths over the years have made it clear that an undue emphasis on not being misled by false allegations can lead professionals and practitioners to ignore the very real facts about serious abuses.

I am very sorry that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot accept new clauses 1 and 2. They are entirely in line with the Government's thinking and would only strengthen section 1 of the Children Act 1989. The paramount interest of children should always be served when courts make decisions about their future. The amendments would clarify those best interests and focus the efforts and attention of judges on them. They would make sure that judges were not swayed by the real pressures exerted by the well articulated and strongly expressed views of warring parents.

My hon. Friend the Minister feels that the Government have enough in the way of powers to deal with the very serious problems that arise, but the evidence that I quoted comes direct from the Government and is more recent than the Committee stage of this Bill. The Government have acknowledged that guidelines have not worked completely effectively so far in ensuring that children are safeguarded in contact and domestic violence cases.

Section 120 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 is a great improvement, but there is also a heavy reliance on guidelines. Given the serious facts of abuse, and the fact that children's experiences and voices are not heard properly and fully by the courts, I am not certain that my hon. Friend the Minister can be fully satisfied that the Government do not need the measures envisaged in new clauses 1 and 2. Those measures are not being urged on the Government only by hon. Members here today; the need for them has been made clear by organisations outside the House that have daily contact with people going through some of the most horrendous experiences that can be imagined.

I will withdraw new clauses 1 and 2. There has been some discussion about my mathematical judgment in previous stages of the Bill's progress through the House, but I am well aware that I need to take into account forces outside the Chamber.

Mr. Grieve: I am the first to acknowledge that, in the context of the debate, the mathematical calculations are rather stacked against the hon. Gentleman unless he has Front-Bench support.

Mr. Dawson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and I appreciate what my hon. Friend the Minister said about serious case reviews, of which Opposition Members were so critical in Standing Committee. I am pleased that that has been resolved and that we have made some significant progress on the matter.

The Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs is about to embark on an inquiry into the work of the family courts. I have no doubt that the question of children and vulnerable adults will come up again and that the Committee will have an opportunity to talk to ministerial colleagues and to the president of the family division of the High Court and her colleagues.

In the hope that we are making some progress, and in the knowledge that progress will be very carefully scrutinised both in this House and outside it, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

AMENDMENTS TO THE YOUTH JUSTICE AND CRIMINAL EVIDENCE ACT 1999 TO EXTEND THE CATEGORY OF WITNESSES ELIGIBLE FOR ASSISTANCE ON GROUNDS OF FEAR OR DISTRESS ABOUT TESTIFYING

'(1) Section 17 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 (c.23) (witnesses eligible for assistance on grounds of fear or distress about testifying) is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (4) insert—

"(4A) Where the complainant in respect of proceedings relating to any form of molestation, including violence, involving a complainant, a cohabitant, a relevant child or associated persons, is a witness in such proceedings, the witness is eligible for assistance in relation to those proceedings by virtue of this subsection unless the witness has informed the court of the witness' wish not to be so eligible by virtue of this subsection.

(4B) For the purposes of this subsection, 'cohabitant', 'relevant child' and 'associated persons' mean a person as defined by section 62 of the Family Law Act 1996 (c.27) (meaning of 'cohabitants', 'relevant child' and 'associated person') as amended by sections 2 and 3 of this Act.".'—[Mr. Heath.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Heath: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 8—Photography of witnesses, etc, in court—

'(1) No person shall—

(a) take, or attempt to take, a photograph in a specified court of any person being a juror, witness in or party to any proceedings before the court, or

(b) photograph, or attempt to photograph, any person in any court if the presiding judge has determined that it would not be in the interests of justice for any photograph to be taken; or

(c) publish, transmit or broadcast any photograph taken in contravention of the foregoing provisions of this section.

(2) Any person acting in contravention of this section shall, on summary conviction, be liable in respect of each offence to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(3) For the purposes of this section—

(a) "specified court" means any magistrates' court, any other court in which criminal proceedings take place, or any other court which the Lord Chancellor may by order prescribe;

(b) "judge" includes a lay judge, district judge, recorder, judge, registrar or coroner;

(c) "photograph" includes any image whether still or moving made by any means whether photographic, electronic or otherwise;

(d) a photograph shall be deemed to be a photograph taken in court if the subject of the photograph is in the courtroom or in the building or in the precincts of the building in which the court is held at the time that the photograph is taken.'.

New clause 9—Amendment to the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 to extend the category of witnesses eligible for assistance on grounds of fear or distress about testifying—

'(1) Section 17 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (1) insert—

"(1B) For the purpose of this chapter an applicant in civil proceedings relating to domestic violence is eligible for assistance by virtue of this subsection if the Court is satisfied that the quality of evidence given by the applicant is likely to be diminished by reason of fear or distress on the part of the applicant in connection with testifying in the proceedings.".'.

Amendment No. 20, in schedule 11, page 86, line 7, at end insert—

'Criminal Justice Act 1925 (c.86) Section 41'.

Mr. Heath: New clause 3 returns us to a matter that we discussed briefly in Committee, but I fear that the Government did not entirely satisfy me that the present arrangements are satisfactory. The new clause deals with the special arrangements that can be made for witnesses who are considered vulnerable or intimidated, such as giving evidence from behind screens or by TV links, which give those people some sense of security in giving their evidence before the courts and have often proved critical elements in determining whether they give evidence at all.

The difficulty is that there is no automaticity in the arrangements, although they are becoming increasingly available. I give credit for that fact. Nevertheless, instead of those who make the original complaint being told, "Don't worry. You will not have to face your abuser in court because we will ensure that special arrangement are made", the best that they can be told is that an application will be made for such arrangements. That will depend on the Crown Prosecution Service making the application, but the CPS does not necessarily act in the interests of the complainant or witness; it is acts in the state's interests in bringing a prosecution. There is a subtle difference between the two. The proposal in new clause 3 is simply that such automaticity should be put in place. Of course, if those arrangements are unnecessary, they will not be provided, but there should be certainty that the witness will receive that protection if it is necessary and on the request of the witness in those circumstances.

At first sight, new clause 9 is similar, but it deals with complainants in domestic violence cases who make application through civil proceedings. Of course, under the Bill, we are widening the scope for civil proceedings, but it is curious that section 17 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 deals with a complainant in criminal proceedings but not with a complainant in civil proceedings. The person will come face to face with the same abusive partner or relative and have the same sense of distress, disquiet or intimidation. The measures under consideration in a civil court will be no less serious than those in the criminal court. It does not seem entirely logical that, in one case, special measures provisions are in place but not in the other. I ask the Minister seriously to consider whether new clause 9 would be a sensible extension of the present arrangements.

New clause 8 and amendment No. 20 deal with a quite different matter. Some would argue that it is tangential to the purpose of the Bill—I freely accept that it is—but this is an opportunity for the House to consider for the first time a issue that was raised, to many people's astonishment, during the summer when the House was not sitting: filming or photography in court.

Without any great prior notice to anyone, the Lord Chancellor announced that he was running an experiment for the filming of proceedings in the Court of Appeal and that he would make further proposals at a later stage. Many hon. Members were alarmed that that was done without a proper announcement in the House. Many of us were alarmed at the possible implications, and many of us felt that benefit would be derived from at least a debate on the circumstances. None of that happened, and it is not unreasonable to say that that is not uncommon in the case of either this Lord Chancellor or his predecessor, sadly.

I have corresponded since then with the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), who is in his place, and his letter to me was extremely helpful in allaying some of my concerns. He said that it was not the intention under any circumstances to allow the broadcast of the filming that was to take place in the Court of Appeal and that the filming would only ever take place there. He said that he shared some of my concerns, which I shall explore in a little more depth in a moment, about the wider implications of filming in court. He also said that the Lord Chancellor intended to publish an exploratory paper, which would not include specific proposals but invite comment on the issue, and that they would carefully consider the arguments before taking any precipitate action. All that I applaud. I shall deal with my views on the subject in a moment.

I was worried by one thing in the letter that I received from the Under-Secretary. During parliamentary questions on Tuesday 7 September, I questioned him specifically about the legal advice that underpinned the decision to allow filming in the Court of Appeal at all. I referred to section 41 of the Criminal Justice Act 1925, which, as hon. Members will recall, expressly prohibits the taking of any photograph or film not only in the court, but in its precincts. The part of the letter that gave me some cause for concern said:

> "We have been advised that section 41 of the Criminal Justice Act 1925, to which you referred, does not bind the Crown."

What on earth are we doing making statutes about the arrangements for courts if they do not bind the courts in any way, even in the simplest terms, about that which is an expressed prohibition. That seems to be nonsense. I question that interpretation, although I accept that almost certainly someone will show that Crown immunity takes precedence over anything that the House chooses to do, but I regret that; it is extraordinary in the circumstances.

Let us be clear about what the 1925 Act does. It expressly prohibits the taking of any photograph or the making of any image of people who are in the court or its precincts. However, we are told that, if one happens to be the Lord Chancellor, one can give permission for that to take place. That is wrong, and it invites all sorts of questions. Why do I think that it is specifically wrong in the case of photography in court? First, there is a very real risk that potential witnesses, victims or jurors will not come forward to appear in court if they believe that they will be photographed or filmed doing so. Secondly, court proceedings are not an entertainment. I have seen in other jurisdictions that allow filming in court a trivialisation of court proceedings, which is wholly detrimental to the process of justice.

I understand the arguments made on the other side of the coin that, somehow, filming in court will increase the understanding of court procedures, but I do not think that it would. What appears on the television screen in those jurisdictions that allow the filming of criminal proceedings is not the laborious work of cross-examination and finding facts, but the point at which the victim breaks down or the defendant says, "Gaw, luvvie, I did it." That is the entertainment value of court television; that is what appears on the news broadcasts, but that does not nothing to increase the awareness of how the judicial process works—rather it does the reverse: it suggests that such things are the matters of a moment and that they are dramatic in content, which, I am afraid to say, careful court work is not.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Some months ago, we discussed what the Government perceived as a rash of cases of jury nobbling. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that bringing television into the arena would make that problem 10 times worse?

3 pm

Mr. Heath: I am convinced that that would happen. I understand the argument that it might be appropriate to film judges delivering their judgments, if they agreed to that, because that could be educational or of interest to people. However, it would not be in the interest of justice for witnesses, jurors or defendants to be filmed. It would not be in the interest of justice to film a criminal trial, a hearing in a coroner's court or proceedings in family or youth courts. Filming civil proceedings would rarely be in the interest of justice.

My proposal is an imperfect redrawing of the provisions of the 1925 Act. I do not intend to press my formulation to a Division, so I hope that the Minister will not spend time raising objections to the specific wording—I simply wanted to encourage debate. It is time for us to consider the matter again, although I am convinced that, by and large, the circumstances that presently apply are in the interest of justice in this country.

It is interesting that the provisions of the 1925 Act have already started to erode. It is not uncommon for people going in and coming out of courts to be filmed. Indeed, a television crew is almost always positioned on the steps of the royal courts of justice. Such crews are in clear breach of section 41 of the 1925 Act because that specifies that people shall not be filmed going in or out of court. I invite the Minister to give his opinion on whether such actions might be a blatant breach of the law as it stands. More importantly, however, I urge him to assure the House that if he proceeds with the experiment any further, he will bring his proposal before the House so that it can be subjected to proper examination and we can decide whether we want extant statute law overturned for the purposes of a prurient and over-demanding television industry.

Vera Baird: I confess that I would be horrified by the prospect of cameras no longer being able to set up outside the royal courts of justice. A major part of most senior QCs' public relations strategies is to cut an appropriate dash while walking along, with hair and bands flowing in the wind, so as to look like no one in the world would dare defy them. What is the world coming to if that is to be stopped?

On a more serious note, may I address the proposal in new clause 3 to extend the automatic application of special measures to victims of domestic violence because there is a lot in that argument? As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) knows, section 17 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 contains two categories of vulnerable and intimidated victims for whom special measures are available: first, those who get special measures automatically, which includes victims of sexual assault and rape; and, secondly, those who get them only at a judge's discretion. Although I use the word "only", the measures for such people are valuable. Domestic violence victims currently fall into the second category.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the current arrangements allow evidence to be given through a television link or from behind a screen. Arrangements can be made whereby barristers remove their wigs and gowns so that they look less intimidating, although I am sure that curbs must be applied on that. The serious measures that have been made available are valuable and proven as being able to improve the quality of evidence put before the courts.

The reason behind the measures is the sensitive nature of the evidence that is likely to be given, especially in sexual assault cases. As I have said—I think that this is pretty widely accepted—domestic violence is almost always accompanied by sexual abuse or sexual violence of one sort or another. Evidence in such cases is sensitive and difficult to obtain, so complainants probably always need the protection of such measures. The situation is even more sensitive in a domestic violence case because a complainant will inevitably be giving evidence against a person with whom she has had a personal and intimate relationship, which makes the process more difficult for her.

The Home Office review on sexual offences called "Speaking up for Justice" was a successful pre-legislative consideration of policies that was much praised. It expected that domestic violence complainants would be placed in the category of people who automatically received the measures. "Safety and Justice", the consultative document underpinning the Bill, raised the question of whether section 17 of the 1999 Act provided the right level of support for all vulnerable victims. A fairly powerful answer to that was received from Home Office research done through the Women's National Commission. The research said that section 17 did not give the right level of support, especially to domestic violence victims. It said that they should go into the automatic category. Two bodies of work that the Government undertook to examine the matter concluded that automatic protection should be available for domestic violence victims.

If a domestic violence victim who does not receive the measures automatically is to receive the protection that she needs, she depends on the alertness of a police officer to the availability of the measures and her need for them. She also requires a representative of the Crown Prosecution Service who is properly trained in the availability of the measures and ready to understand when they are needed. Of course, the discretion of a judge is required in the end. The most significant problem that exists if automatic protection is not available is that a person cannot be given a guarantee in advance of going to court that she will be protected by special measures. Everyone knows how difficult it can be to get complainants in domestic violence cases to come to court at all. Conviction rates are extremely low, and most of the drop-out occurs between the time at which the domestic violence occurs and the time at which the case reaches the door of the court. It could only be helpful if a woman who was unsure about her courage and confidence to go through with the process could be guaranteed by a police officer at the outset that she would not have to give evidence in the presence of the perpetrator if she did not want to do so. She would thus know that she would not have to look him full in the face and face the prospect of him doing everything possible to intimidate her.

New clause 3 would protect domestic violence complainants in not only criminal cases, but civil cases. Civil cases are usually conducted in private. They are usually held in smaller courts than those used for criminal cases and fewer people tend to be present. The relative intimacy of the environment is likely to make the experience more intimidating for a woman who has suffered domestic violence or sexual abuse because the person against whom there is a complaint would be sitting within a few yards of her. Anything that could be done to help such a woman would be every bit as valuable as a measure in the criminal context. I urge the Minister to think carefully about whether it is time to reconsider the provision and extend its ambit. Its purpose is to protect vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, which it has been proven to do. This category of people needs to be within its protection.

A case was drawn to my attention by my local domestic violence advocacy set-up. There were serious allegations of domestic violence between a husband and wife. The husband came to court without representatives and sought the judge's leave, which was granted, to cross-examine her on the claims of domestic violence and sexual abuse. We turned our backs on that practice in the criminal courts in 1999 by stopping defendants in rape cases from cross-examining their victims.

This situation is another manifestation of the same problem. It is probably the case that it should not be allowed either. Now that the penny has dropped with the authorities far and wide that domestic violence and sexual abuse are part and parcel of the same syndrome in 99 per cent. of cases, we have to consider whether we should prevent someone in a case in which domestic violence is a hot issue in the family context from cross-examining. What happens is that the individual is taken through the incidents in detail and is made to relive them face to face with the perpetrator in a public forum. The court simply goes along with it, and in the context of the civil case it has no choice but to do so. That problem needs specific consideration and is another reason why at least special measures should be available to protect someone in that situation. I commend the new clauses to the Minister.

Mr. Llwyd: I agree entirely with the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and the purport of the new clauses. Like her, I have had many experiences of domestic violence in the criminal and civil courts. Her point about civil proceedings being just as bad if not worse than the criminal forum is right. They may well be held in private, but they are usually held in more confined courts with a judge considering a non-molestation order or an ouster order. The issues are the same, involving violence and a vulnerable witness who has to retell a horrible incident in her life. It is important that we do everything we can to make it possible for that person to give her evidence as comfortably as possible. After all is said and done, we fail her and the process, and undermine the idea of justice, if we do not do that.

The new clauses on the criminal courts and the civil courts are right. I hope that the Minister will carefully consider our points. The original special provisions of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 were introduced because youths are often vulnerable. By definition, a person who is subjected to domestic violence is in the most vulnerable category of all.

On automaticity, I take it that that would apply unless the complainant said otherwise. That is the right way to proceed. The automatic rule should not always be applied. Indeed, applying it would, perhaps, undermine the importance of the measure in a circuitous way. Judges will be able to weigh up whether that is right or wrong in due course.

The debate is useful. From my personal experience, I can say that the new clauses have much to commend them. From a practitioner's point of view, people are often afraid to come forward and when they do, on the morning of the court, they decline to give evidence. That is fully understandable because of the nature of the proceedings. I am not criticising complainants, but it is a huge waste of everyone's time, including the courts and lawyers, and it is a build up of pressure for that poor complainant who, at the last minute, falls back and says that she cannot go through with it. If it is known from the beginning that the provision can be obtained and that the complainant will not face, in a small enclosed room, the person who has abused her, that will go a considerable way towards enabling people with complaints to come forward and to give the evidence as it should be heard by the judge and as the court should decide on it.

3.15 pm

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) mentioned cameras in the courts, which he described as a tangential point. They are not a good idea for numerous reasons, including jury nobbling, as I said in my intervention on the hon. and learned Member for Redcar. In all honesty, however, and with regard to the Home Secretary, I do not think that there is anything wrong with the Court of Appeal. There is no question of nobbling the Court of Appeal. It has a high standard of judiciary on every bench—I must be careful of what I say—but we are dealing with people who routinely make the law in the changes that they make. From the point of view of a practitioner, a student and public access, I do not envisage a great objection to a pilot in the Court of Appeal, but to extend it beyond that forum would be a grave mistake for many reasons, many of which are not pertinent to today's debate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): There are two parts to the group of amendments. The first concerns protecting complainants in domestic violence cases. The second involves photography or television in court proceedings. New clause 3 is about automaticity of special measures in all domestic violence cases and new clause 9 deals specifically with civil proceedings and the use of special measures.

It is worth noting that special measures to protect vulnerable or intimidated witnesses were introduced by the Government in the 1999 Act. We made the improvements to encourage witnesses to come forward and overcome some of the barriers to giving evidence. Those special measures include screens to ensure that witnesses do not see the defendant and vice versa and the use of a live television link to the court room, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said. In some circumstances, they involve clearing the court so that evidence can be given in private, allowing the removal of wigs and gowns—which some people find intimidating—and the use of intermediaries to help the witness to communicate with her legal team and the court, especially if there are language difficulties. The measures often include the recording of video evidence—the evidence-in-chief—of a witness. In fact, the main bulk can be pre-recorded and presented to the court. That range of aids, known collectively as special measures, are relatively new. They are beginning to work well and are proving popular in some courts.

It is true that there are different categories of offences for the application of special measures. Unless the complainant opts out, there is automatic access to them in cases of alleged sexual offences, but given the special and sensitive nature of sexual offence allegations, which merit automatic availability of special measures, the law has been framed to make the distinction between automaticity for those cases and the ability to apply, and often be granted, special measures in other cases. Although we can all understand why that automatic arrangement exists in sexual offences cases, it may well not suit a variety of other cases to have an automatic arrangement, not least if a witness wants to face up to their perpetrator. I accept that that is not common in domestic violence cases, but it can be in other cases.

I am cautious about the new clauses because we are still in the early days of rolling out the special measures. Good work is under way, but some courts are still feeling their way forward. We should not underestimate, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will appreciate, the significant change in culture that is taking place in many courts, but it is right that that should proceed. More work is under way on the "no witness, no justice" initiative, to ensure that there is a comprehensive approach to meeting witness needs.

Vera Baird: My hon. Friend spoke about a situation in which a victim might want to confront the perpetrator. Under the 1999 Act, as the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) said, that option is automatically available, but if he or she does not want it they can choose to opt out. The point is that it should be guaranteed to people who do want it.

Mr. Leslie: I accept that there are good arguments for the extension of special measures and the streamlining of the process that triggers them. My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs suggested, for example, that there are good grounds for extending to civil courts, particularly in antisocial behaviour cases, the availability of special measures. There is a discussion in the legal community and in government about how we can extend certain provisions and make them easier to access. However, we must strike the right balance and recognise that, traditionally, many cases are heard in public. The first priority, of course, is that justice should be done, but the second is that it should be seen to be done. However, we should not throw away lightly the principle of allowing justice to be done, at least partly, in the public arena. It is important to evaluate properly the roll-out of special measures.

Mr. Llwyd: I do not follow the Minister's argument. Special measures for witnesses would not result in the hearing being held in camera. It would be held in public, but the witness, typically a woman, would be protected from the perpetrator of violence. Nobody is arguing that proceedings should be in camera—they should be held in public—but there should be protection for witnesses.

Mr. Leslie: That is certainly true of many special measures but, as I said, clearing the court and public gallery to hold a hearing in private is one option in the special measures arsenal available to the judge and the court. We should be careful not to adopt a blanket approach to special measures, and must make sure that we have the right combination available for every case. As I said, we should evaluate carefully, but fairly quickly, what works best in which situations. Members on both sides of the House probably agree that we need to find ways of making victims and witnesses come forward and give evidence. Providing assurances at the outset is one method of doing so, but I beg hon. Members' indulgence as we need to look at an array of issues, including the use of video evidence versus recorded evidence. We must shift the balance in favour of victims and witnesses, but we must make sure that we get that right in relation to the legislation.

New clause 9 deals with civil proceedings, especially family cases. In those circumstances, I accept that victims of domestic violence can be fearful and feel intimidated in court. Most cases heard in the civil courts do not involve allegations of domestic violence. Alleged perpetrators are generally not on trial, and a finding against them does not usually lead to punishments such as a fine or imprisonment. The main witness, usually the victim, is already known to them.

Mr. Heath: To clarify an arcane point, under the Bill a criminal court will act as a civil court in making a restraining order following acquittal or conviction. However, will special measures available to witnesses in criminal court proceedings still be available in civil court proceedings?

Mr. Leslie: My understanding of the differences between the civil and criminal court is uneducated, but my answer is yes. The criminal court does not stop being a criminal court when it hears those cases. It will simply hear evidence admissible under civil proceedings.

The proposals in clause 1 to criminalise the breach of non-molestation orders mean that one of the most contentious and confrontational hearings in family courts can now be dealt with in the criminal court, where special measures will be available. Judges in the family court already have wide powers in cases in which they decide a victim is vulnerable or intimidated, for instance children or victims of domestic violence, and can take action to assist them in giving evidence. Such cases are usually heard in private, and wigs and gowns are not worn. Where civil and criminal courts share premises it is much easier for the technology needed for special measures, such as a video link arrangement, to be shared. A small number of courts, however, do not yet have that technology, and we are trying our best, not least through Her Majesty's Court Service, to extend those facilities as best we can. Generally, we are making progress and there are provisions in the civil and family courts to enable supported evidence to be given.

Amendment No. 20 and new clause 8 deal with other matters. New clause 8 would replace the blanket prohibition on photography in court with a prohibition on the photographing of jurors, witnesses and parties to the case, but there would be discretion to photograph judges and lawyers. That provokes an interesting debate, so I welcome the tabling of the provision. On 29 August, the Secretary of State announced that the Government would shortly publish a consultation document on broadcasting court proceedings. There are no proposals to change existing legislation, but there will be a thorough examination, not least in the light of relatively recent developments such as the televising of Parliament, of the pros and cons of relaxing the blanket restrictions on broadcasting in the courts.

Since 1990, the House of Lords Appellate Committee judgments have been televised because they have taken place in the Chamber of the other place. If, however, through the constitutional reform programme we create a new separate supreme court, we need to think about how its judgments would be broadcast. We know that public confidence is aided when the justice system operates in the public arena and there are arguments in favour of a substantial degree of public access, but as I said, justice must be done and be seen to be done. That is not a sequential process; there is a priority order. Justice being done comes first, and we would not support anything that could deter witnesses or victims from coming forward and giving evidence. As hon. Members suggested, if it was thought that a television camera might be filming sensitive moments, I can easily imagine that might be the case.

That is why the Secretary of State said that he did not consider that appropriate. However, there may be other forums, as has been said—the Appeal Court, for instance—which do not usually have evidence in chief and where it might be appropriate to experiment. We are piloting in private, not to be broadcast, a scheme with the royal courts of justice, which will be strictly limited and controlled, in the circumstances that I set out to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome.

I hope that I have covered the full breadth of the amendments and new clauses and that the hon. Gentleman will seek leave to withdraw them.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful for the Minister's comments. He has not entirely satisfied me, but I do not intend to press the new clause. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 16

HIGHER FIXED PENALTY FOR REPEATED ROAD TRAFFIC OFFENCES

Mrs. Gillan: I beg to move amendment No. 65, in page 10, line 22, leave out clause 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 11, in page 10, line 29, leave out from 'driving' to end of line 31.

3.45 pm

Mrs. Gillan: On 14 June, the House gave the Bill a Second Reading. All hon. Members who were present witnessed an amazing act of magic performed by Home Secretary. He had come under much fire for his proposals to surcharge speeding motorists and was under some pressure when he rose in the Chamber. He sought to deflect anger by making specific statements in his opening speech on Second Reading, when he said:

> "we accept that it would be wrong for low-level first-time offences to be subject to a surcharge. Helpfully, the Department for Transport will shortly consult on changes in the points system for fixed penalty notices. The new system will be introduced in 2006, which is when we will consider introducing a levy of £10 on fixed penalty notices for serious repeat offenders, as opposed to general fixed penalty notices."—[Official Report, 14 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 540.]

That allayed the many fears of those inside and outside Parliament.

Indeed, so well did the Home Secretary camouflage his intentions and succeed in creating a smoke screen, that the trick that he performed on us led even the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) to praise him for ensuring that "muggers, not motorists" would pay for the support of victims.

Mr. Heath: I wish to confess that I made a grave error of judgment. I took the Home Secretary at his word and believed him when he said that he would deal with serious, persistent offenders, not people who go through two speed cameras at 33 mph.

Mrs. Gillan: I am afraid that we all fell for the trick. Even outside organisations genuinely believed that the Home Secretary had almost dropped his proposals to prey on the motorist.

When the measure reached Committee, however, we discovered the Government's genuine proposals and their definition of a serious and persistent offender. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome is right: a serious and persistent offender turned out to be someone who was caught by a speed camera not once, but twice; not three or four times, but twice. Such a person constitutes a persistent and serious offender. It became obvious, despite the Under-Secretary's charm, that the attempt to impose yet another stealth tax on the motorist was alive, well and progressing. That is because the Government intend that every motorist who gets caught speeding more than once—that is, twice or more—

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Duh!

Mrs. Gillan: Well, I need to spell this out. Twice constitutes persistence. Every such motorist will have to pay a surcharge of £5. So a persistent and serious offender is someone who is snapped by a speed camera doing a couple of miles per hour over the speed limit twice. Well, in my book, twice does not mean persistence. We need to be very careful before we label this type of offender "serious", when the issue is put into a wider context. Driving at 100 mph in a 40 mph zone is serious, but the word should not be used to describe the driver who slips over the limit unintentionally.

Indeed, one of the problems that this issue raises was thrown up in the Home Office's own consultation, from which I would like to quote, as it is a matter of public record.

Chris Bryant: I think that the hon. Lady has just said that she wants to introduce a new test of intentionality into this issue—in other words, that she wants to test whether someone has unintentionally gone over the speed limit. How would she adjudicate such matters?

Mrs. Gillan: That is absolutely not what I said. I have no intention of introducing a test. I am asking the Minister to wipe this proposal out of the Bill and to stop preying on the motorist. The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong in his assumption.

Let me turn to Mr. Holdsworth, who wrote to the Minister:

> "My 80-year-old mother who had an excellent driving record with no convictions in over 50 years of motoring now has three points on her licence for going over the limit on a main road at 11 o'clock at night nowhere near a school by 5 mph. Does that make her a criminal who should contribute to criminal convictions? After the stress on her of dealing with this fine (for example, having her in tears for several hours) I think that it is the Government that should be paying into a victims fund to contribute to the criminal extraction of money from her."

He happens to add:

> "After voting Labour all my life . . . I'm finally going to vote Conservative next time."

Hypothetically, if that lady did that again, she would be branded a persistent and serious offender by the Government.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I concede at once that I do not have the hinterland in this matter that my hon. Friend has. Would she be good enough to say where in the Bill we can find any statement on the level of the charge? She will also be aware that it will be raised by the negative procedure, which means that the House will never actually vote on the impost to be levied.

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. There is some doubt as to whether the charge will be £10, as referred to by the Home Secretary on Second Reading, or £5, as referred to by the Minister in Committee. I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify this, otherwise the House will have no knowledge of this matter and no say on it at this stage, which would be very serious.

The Home Secretary has referred to a consultation being carried out by the Department for Transport later in the year. We have had to wait a long time for that consultation to emerge. In fact, it emerged on 1 September this year, when the Transport Secretary announced that he was going to consult on a fairer system of penalties for motorists caught speeding. The implication of that is that the existing system is unfair and needs to be put right.

In that consultation, there is reference to a lower penalty of two points and a £40 fine. That is not applicable if someone exceeds the 20 mph speed limit but drives at under 31 mph, but it is applicable in relation to other speed limits. For example, someone who is caught driving at 39 mph in a 30 mph zone will attract a penalty of two points and a £40 fine. Someone travelling at between 40 and 44 mph in such a zone would get three points and a £60 fine, and if they were doing 45 mph, they would get six points and £100 fine. Ironically, they would get only two points if they were travelling at 72 mph in a 60 mph zone. That has to be looked at very carefully. It is obvious from the consultation that someone who had had four points put on their licence twice, at the lower end of the limit, could attract the surcharge—the stealth tax—that the Government are intent on putting on motorists. So I hope that the Minister will tell us that he was consulted before the matter was put out for consultation, that there has been joined-up thinking between the Home Office and the Department for Transport, and that there is no intention to lower the fines on speeding offenders to hide the surcharge, in order to pretend that the Government are not being so hard on the motorist.

[Mrs. Gillan]

In Committee, we tried hard to dissuade the Minister from pursuing this measure, but absolutely to no avail. My hon. Friends and other members of the Committee deployed some very good arguments, but at the time we did not have the advantage of seeing the papers that were sent in to the Department during the consultation. I did challenge the Minister in Committee to produce the results of the consultation, and he did so. They have been extremely enlightening and I thank him for them. If he will not listen to Members of the House on this proposal, will he first listen to the AA Motoring Trust?

Mr. Hogg: Will my hon. Friend also make the point that the Minister should only listen to relevant Members of the House? She will observe that this clause applies to England and Wales only. Would it not be inappropriate to listen to Members who represent Scottish constituencies?

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. and learned Friend is tempting me down the road, and I will follow him down it.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Not at speed, I hope.

Mrs. Gillan: I will take it at my own steady pace, thank you very much, and I will not take it at speed, but I agree entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend. The Minister should only be consulting England and Wales Members, as they represent the people to whom the legislation will apply.

I return to the AA Motoring Trust. It wrote to the consultation co-ordinator of the performance and delivery unit at the Home Office—if that is not a contradiction in terms—to say:

> "However, there is one area which we would strongly oppose—the proposal to impose a £5 surcharge on the fixed penalty system for motoring offences. The AA Trust considers the proposal to impose this surcharge to be ill conceived and bordering on the inept."

I am not sure which part of > "ill conceived and bordering on the inept"

the Minister would not understand. I think that the AA Motoring Trust, although I admit that it may be seen to have a vested interest, has made a very strong point.

Let us consider other consultees who do not necessarily have a vested interest. The Association of British Insurers wrote:

> "ABI does not support the use of a surcharge.
> Funding for improved support for victims of crime should be provided by the perpetrators of those crimes. More stringent and efficient collection of fines already imposed by the criminal justice system, along with the money collected from orders under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, could raise significant funding for improved victim support and compensation, without the need to impose a surcharge.
> Motorists already contribute to victims of crime by way of the Motor Insurers' Bureau (MIB). The MIB was set up by insurers in 1946 to compensate the victims of uninsured and 'hit and run' motorists. The increased policy costs to cover the provision of compensation to victims of uninsured drivers is estimated to be up to an additional £30 on each policy. Adding a surcharge to fines for offences such as speeding would be a further burden on those motorists who meet their statutory insurance obligations, representing a double charge".

Perhaps the Minister will say to me that the Association of British Insurers has a vested interest, but let us look at what the Devon and Cornwall police said to the Minister.

> "A surcharge on FPNs—

fixed penalty notices—

> "for excess speed offences will only serve to cause even greater alienation of the motoring public from the police. The present system under netting off has created unexpected levels of media interest and huge volumes of correspondence from the public."

So the Devon and Cornwall police are not exactly keen on the proposal of the Minister and the Home Secretary.

Another police force, the Greater Manchester police, also came up with some valid points. It said to the Minister:

> "The idea of using fixed penalty tickets to raise funds is severely flawed, especially where the use of the Road Traffic Act, GATSO and other camera detection methods are used".

It continued:

> "At the moment only 60 per cent. of the tickets issued by these means are paid. The 40 per cent. of the tickets that are not paid, and the moneys that are not recovered from those tickets, are from vehicles that are not registered to anyone, stolen cars, cars on false number plates, cars that are used by the criminal element in society.
> The 60 per cent. that are paid are therefore paid by the more responsible and 'law-abiding' persons in society. This means therefore that the offenders in society will not be contributing to the fund, but it is another form of taxation on the motorist".

I remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that those are the comments of the Greater Manchester police. It continued:

> "The popularity of these 'Speed Cameras and GATSO cameras' is low, and they are already seen as a money spinner for central government. To impose an extra £5 penalty to fund victims would not be a popular move. What happens to the funds that are raised from these cameras at present, and why cannot a proportion of the existing fine be diverted to the Victim Fund? This would provide funds without further alienating the motorist".

I could not have put it better myself. I hope that the Minister will answer Greater Manchester police and explain why a proportion of the existing fine cannot be diverted, if that is the way that he wants to go. As the Greater Manchester police says, it is mostly the law-abiding public and responsible members of society who will face that charge.

Mr. Llwyd: I agree with what the hon. Lady says. There is a strange kind of logic about penalising a repeat offender the second time for the same offence, and in this instance, an unthinking logic, if I may put it that way. The person who is convicted twice has six points, three times, nine points, and so on. Therefore, such a person will be under pressure, and should realise that they are getting nearer disqualification each time. I speak as one who has a point-laden licence, I confess, so I speak from some experience. Therefore, the extra £5 is not needed—it is, as Arthur Daley would say, a nice little earner and nothing else.

Mrs. Gillan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I agree entirely that there is a strange kind of logic to the proposal, and I commiserate with him.

There are two other responses to the consultation that the House should hear about and that the Minister should address. The first of those is from the Police Federation, which started off quite generously, as I think that the Minister will agree:

> "We wholeheartedly endorse the proposals to add a surcharge on those who have been convicted of criminal offences or those who receive a penalty notice, fine or imprisonment for disorder".

So far so good. It then said:

> "We cannot however support in any way surcharges on fixed penalty notices for Road Traffic Offences. We are aware of the research into other similar schemes in other countries across the world, and the apparent success of those schemes in raising revenue for victim assistance. However, we are firmly of the opinion that surcharges on fixed penalties for traffic offences would cause an unwelcome backlash from the general public that would considerably damage the relationship between the police service and the communities they serve".

There we have it. That is the Police Federation speaking on behalf of all the police throughout this country. It thinks that the Government's proposals to surcharge the motorist will damage the relationship between the police and the public. The Minister ought to take that seriously.

The last response to the consultation that I want to read out is from the Magistrates Association, which represents the people who sit on the bench, who are at the sharp end and who must deal with these offenders. It said:

> "A surcharge on fixed penalty notices for motoring offences would be seen by many motorists as a further hidden tax on motorists and added to the argument on the use of more speed cameras as tax collection. This would draw the courts into the argument with the real potential of a loss of credibility and liable to the charge of courts being used as tax collectors. This should be avoided".

Any reasonable person can see from all those submissions to the consultation that we should drop this part of the Bill. Therefore, I hope to be allowed to press amendment No. 11 to the vote at the appropriate time.

I turn to another aspect of the proposal, because I did not receive a satisfactory answer in Committee. I may be doing the Minister a disservice, but I have not come across the letter that fully explains to me how he will deal with the issue. I refer to the possibility that people being surcharged can exchange their fine and surcharge for work. I will not delay the House by hunting for the appropriate passage in the Committee proceedings, but he said that he was not sure how the proposals would work but that it would be possible to exchange the fine and the surcharge for work. It will be interesting to find out exactly what he has done in the meantime to clarify those proposals.

I also hope that the Minister will clarify the financial side to the operation. The figures that we were working on at Second Reading and in Committee were those for 2002, which seemed to be the latest date for which he had the information. He told us that 1.7 million fixed penalty notices were issued, but then said that the estimated administrative cost of collecting this stealth tax would be approximately £1.6 million. For every £5 that is surcharged, approximately £1 will go in administration costs. Only £4 will ever go into a victims fund.

We are seeing £1 disappear in bureaucracy but that is coupled with the fact that the collection of fines is now running at anything between 50 and 75 per cent. I acknowledge that there has been an improvement recently, but let us not get carried away. It could be a temporary blip; one swallow does not make a summer. As the figure was running at 50 per cent. before the drive to improve the collection rate of fines, we could, on the figure of 1.7 million, expect to obtain £8.5 million. If a quarter of those fines and surcharges are lost in non-payment and if we add in the administrative costs, £3.8 million will disappear straight away. That is not very good value for money, is it? I do not think it is good value for money, because if the Minister was expecting £8.5 million for the victims fund, he will find that he gets nowhere there that. However, he will create and build up an enormous bureaucracy and the enormous resentment and problems that were evidenced in those very honest submissions to the consultation.

The bottom line is that the criminals will be laughing all the way to the bank. Once again, they will get away without paying for their crimes but the inadvertent, middle-class motorist whom the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) mentioned in Committee and who is a responsible member of society will end up bearing the cost. For all those reasons, I seriously ask the Minister to think again and remove this unpopular, unnecessary and costly attack on the motorist from the Bill.

Mr. Heath: This Government have a peculiar and almost unique genius for taking a good idea and making a complete pig's ear of it, and this is another instance of exactly that. When the proposal for a victims support fund was announced, the general view in the House and among the public was that it was a sensible idea to make the criminal pay something back to the victim of crime. I certainly welcomed it, as did members of other parties.

Most of us saw the measure as—I think I used this term in Committee—a crude form of restorative justice. It provided a degree of proper recompense. A person who had been properly convicted would pay the surcharge, and life would be made a little more bearable for victims of crime. So far so good; then the Home Secretary took it into his head to include in the category of criminals those convicted of motoring offences.

Some who are convicted of motoring offences are indeed criminals; they have committed a serious crime through the reckless or heedless operation of a motor vehicle. They are a menace to society and should be dealt with accordingly. But we all know, because we live in the real world, that many people do not fall into that category but find themselves in receipt of fixed-penalty tickets.

I confess, as I confessed earlier in an intervention on the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), that I was enormously relieved when I heard the Home Secretary say in terms on Second Reading that he had listened to representations by my party and others, and that a victims fund, properly constituted, would be paid for by the mugger and not the motorist. I believed him when he told us that he had taken the message on board, and would amend his proposals accordingly.

I was frankly astonished when, at a late stage in Committee, we were faced with a huge panoply of amendments, including the Government's proposal to define a serious and persistent offender as someone who at some stage has been caught twice by a speed camera.

[Mr. Heath]

If we continue to see such inflation of terms, we shall have to rewrite the entire language of jurisprudence. It is a nonsense, and the Minister knows it.

I am not one who takes lightly the problem of dangerous or speeding motorists. I always try hard to obey speed controls, and—unlike the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), it appears—I have a clean licence at the moment, touch wood; I am very happy about that. I entirely understand the position of the hon. Members for Chesham and Amersham and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), but whatever their own views, I do not side with some of their colleagues who appear to think that every speed camera represents an imposition on civil liberties and an affront to the freedoms of the motorist. That is simply not the case.

Mrs. Gillan: I would never want to give the impression that there is not a perfectly proper role for speed cameras. Indeed, I have requested them on certain roads in my constituency. I abhor people who break the speed limit, and would not want to diminish the offence.

Mr. Heath: We are at one on that. I am merely saying that some members of the hon. Lady's party have given the impression that they are leading some sort of crusade against speed cameras. That is unfortunate and regrettable, and against the interests of road safety.

There is, however, a big difference between recognising the requirements of road safety and believing that it is fair to impose this measure on top of what is already a stringent penalty; it has still to be reviewed, we understand from the Department for Transport. At present the motorist incurs both a fine and an endorsement, which is often the greatest deterrent in terms of future misdemeanours because of the totting-up process that leads to the loss of a licence. However, if we want a way to define a serious and persistent offender in motoring terms, we have one: the points process and disqualification. I would have no difficulty with those who were disqualified or convicted of a serious driving offence—using the term "serious" in its proper sense—being brought into that definition. If they have committed the same offence several times, clearly they are persistent offenders.

4.15 pm

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman seems to be allowing himself a little wriggle room. What counts as "persistent"? Two, three or several offences? At what point does he set the limit?

Mr. Heath: There is no wriggle room at all. I have made it perfectly clear that disqualification is the definition.

Chris Bryant: So three counts as persistent?

Mr. Heath: Well, there is a different points tariff, as the hon. Gentleman may understand, for certain motoring offences, so three would not necessarily be the figure. Disqualification suggests that the person in question is a serious or persistent offender in road traffic law terms, so we have a definition. So where is the problem? Why does the definition have to be set at the level of the second offence? The answer, the Minister hopes, is that enormous revenue will result. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham has already pointed out some of the difficulties attached even to that proposition, but that is undoubtedly the motivating force.

The Minister wants a victims support fund sufficient to make a real difference, and the best way to do that is to tax the motorist to provide it. He told us in Committee that, in 2002, 1,505,504 endorsable speeding offences were committed, so we are dealing with a significant part of the population. They are being treated as though they were criminals who should contribute to a fund for the victims of crime. That is wrong in principle, and I am particularly aggrieved by what I think was a blatant deceit—if that is a parliamentary term—on the Home Secretary's part.

Chris Bryant: It does not sound very parliamentary.

Mr. Heath: If it is not parliamentary, I of course withdraw—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should withdraw the rather direct accusation that he made. If he wishes to suggest that there was a discrepancy, it should be done in another way.

Mr. Heath: Absolutely, Mr. Deputy Speaker; immediately before you stood up, I did indicate that I should be very happy to withdraw that remark. But I must say that the Home Secretary is clearly not a man from whom I should like to buy a used car. I am very concerned; on comparing carefully the impression that he gave to the House and the reality of what is proposed in the Bill, I find very little correlation between the two.

I hope that the House will look very carefully at my amendment No. 11, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham and her colleagues for putting their names to it. They have said that they would prefer to divide on it and so would I; not because it is my amendment, but simply because it deals with the specific issue of the second offence, rather than the generality of traffic offences. If we do not take a stand on this, the result will be not only an injustice to very many motorists, but—more importantly, from my point of view—the undoing of all the good work that the Government have done in recent months in arguing for the useful function performed by speed cameras, traffic restrictions and traffic-calming measures. Their provision will cement in the public mind the view that all that is simply a front for what is a revenue-raising measure.

The point that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham made in quoting Devon and Cornwall police will be echoed by police forces throughout the country. They have a difficult enough job as it is enforcing traffic law without it being made more difficult by the Minister's applying an arbitrary surcharge on their endeavours. That is wrong, and I hope that this House will reject it. If not, I hope that the other House will.

Mr. Hogg: I want to support the arguments that were advanced very clearly by my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and, indeed, by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). In doing so, I want to make three points. First, as regards the principle, I find it difficult to justify the proposition that a victims fund should be funded in part by people whose criminal culpability is at the very low end of the spectrum. It seems to me that if we were to fund a victims fund by raising money from criminals, there should be some relationship between the quality of the criminal act relied upon and the nature of the injury suffered by the victim. With speeding offences that do not result in personal injury, there is no such relationship of any kind. Drivers who are disqualified under the totting-up procedure may not themselves be guilty of criminal offences of any high degree of gravity. I find it very difficult to justify in principle why individuals whose criminal culpability is, or may be, at a very low level should be required to contribute to the victims fund in the way that we are debating now. It is an objection on principle.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham made some points about repeated offences and other matters with which I entirely agree. I associate myself with what she said, but my fundamental objection is on principle: there is no relationship between the quality of the offence and the injury in respect of which the fund is intended to address.

Chris Bryant: I think the point that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is making—he will correct me if I have misunderstood him—is that if someone is speeding and hits someone else, thereby causing personal injury, it is a grave crime; whereas if someone is speeding and does not hit anyone else, it is nowhere near as grave.

Mr. Heath: That is what the law says.

Chris Bryant: Indeed, but the point is that we have to reduce everyone's speeding. Otherwise, when people are hit, it will cause further damage to individuals.

Mr. Hogg: I think that one has to go back to first principles and ask oneself in respect of people who have committed a criminal offence, what is the nature and level of culpability? That, of course, clearly goes to the nature of the penalty. If we are in the process of doing something different, such as requiring a person judged to be a criminal to compensate someone who has suffered an injury as a result of an alleged crime, there has to be some relationship—not a direct one, but some relationship—between the quality of the act adjudged to be criminal and the quality of the injury in respect of which compensation is to be paid.

We all know that those who drive too fast may do so to only a small extent. The idea that they are somehow obliged to make a contribution to a fund to compensate someone who has been the victim of a serious mugging is, I find, impossible to justify. There is no sort of relationship that applies in those circumstances. It will be perceived to be inequitable and wrong. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) may not agree with me, but at least he knows where I am coming from.

I have a range of other objections, which I shall make fairly briefly; partly because I have been heard on these particular hobby-horses before. Nevertheless, I will get on a number of those hobby-horses again. The first pertains to the negative procedure. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham has characterised the surcharge as a tax. She makes rather a good point, as it is close to a tax: if it is to be levied at all, it will be levied under the negative procedure.

Let us be plain about what the negative procedure means. It means that a tax will be levied, if it is levied, without the House voting on it. This House will not be called on to vote for it. The House will remember the old dictum of no taxation without representation; lo and behold, that is precisely what the clause proposes. If we go down the road of imposing a tax, surely it should be by way of the affirmative procedure. I very much dislike the affirmative procedure because, as the House knows, affirmative orders cannot be amended, but at least they require the consent of both Houses. Here we are talking about an order that will impose a tax but will never be voted on.

We are entitled to ask what tax will be levied. I can find nothing in the Bill that makes it plain what sum will be the subject of the surcharge. The Bill gives the Secretary of State powers, which are not properly constrained, to impose a tax without representation.

A further defect is that the Bill does not oblige the Secretary of State to impose a surcharge, but merely empowers him to do so if he chooses. If the House thinks that a surcharge should be imposed, we should make the duty mandatory and not merely permissive. I see no merit in creating a permissive power in circumstances of this kind.

Mrs. Gillan: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is no incentive for the Government to improve their success in collecting fines or fixed penalty notices? If the form of taxation that is the proposed surcharge does not yield the amount of money expected for the victims fund, the Bill contains no brake on the Secretary of State increasing it proportionately. There is no safeguard to ensure that motorists will not find that they have to pay £50 on top of the fine in, say, two years' time.

Mr. Hogg: That may well be right. What is more, as I said earlier, the amount will be raised without parliamentary authority, as there will be no vote on the matter.

The last of my specific points is another of my hobby-horses; I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will forgive me when I note that the clause applies only to England and Wales and not to Northern Ireland or Scotland. I hasten to say that I do not object to that, but I do object to the fact that the clause could be voted on tonight—as could the negative orders, if they were brought before the House—by hon. Members who do not represent constituencies in England and Wales. A very bizarre proposition follows from that. It is that imposts that, in essence, are taxation will be voted on by Members of Parliament who do not represent the areas subject to that taxation. That strikes me as very offensive, as it amounts to taxation without accountability.

I know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you want me to be brief and that you have heard me speak about these matters many times. I am against the proposals in the Bill, for the reasons that I have advanced. I think that the proposal is wrong in principle, and I do not like the use of the negative procedure. I am very much against imposing taxes without representation, and I think that it is quite wrong for hon. Members who do not represent constituencies in England and Wales to have any part in this business.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on introducing this amendment, and on highlighting the duplicitous and underhand way in which the Government introduced this measure. It is another stealth tax on motorists, and the timing of its introduction is extraordinary. Last week, a Minister said that a Bill on road safety would appear in the Queen's Speech. That would be the appropriate vehicle for legislation on this matter, if indeed legislation were needed.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said, the proposal purports to raise money for a victims fund, but most speeding offences are, fortunately, victimless. We penalise speeding because of the potential danger that it poses to others, so penalties are imposed for reasons of deterrence. However, fixed penalty notices are imposed only when the excess speeds involved are modest rather than severe. If a motorist is detected driving at very great speeds, he does not have the option of going for the fixed penalty notice, as the prosecuting authorities will require the matter to be referred to the magistrates court. As a result, the Bill surcharges fixed penalty notices even though, by definition, they apply to the lesser offences in any particular category.

Speed cameras are also used to raise revenue, and that is one reason why they have fallen into disrepute. The best way to help victims of speeding drivers is through education. That is why Conservative Members argue that the so-called camera safety partnership funds into which the fixed penalties for speeding offences are paid should be available for use in road safety education, generally, and driver improvement programmes in particular. Surely if the Government are serious about helping the victims of speeding motorists, the first thing that they could do, without having to amend the Bill or introduce such a proposal, is allow the funds to which I refer to be allocated for road safety education and driver improvement programmes.

4.30 pm

Sadly, the more the Government impose stealth taxes on motorists and penalise them to a greater extent than is reasonable for minor infringements, the more the burden of fatalities on the roads increases. In the past five years, the number of fatalities on our roads has increased under the Government. A Government who were more contrite would wonder why and say, "Perhaps we got the psychology of penalising motorists with fixed penalty notices wrong, and this is just compounding the felony."

Paul Goggins: I shall remind hon. Members what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said on Second Reading. I reminded hon. Members of this in Committee, and I do so again today in view of the comments that have been made. He said:

> "Following the consultation, we accept that it would be wrong for low-level first-time offences to be subject to a surcharge."—[Official Report, 14 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 540.]

He listened to the consultation and was quite clear about that. Under the Bill, therefore, any offender who commits a road traffic offence for the first time and receives penalty points on their licence will not have to pay the surcharge.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister is quite right—I quoted the record in exactly the same way—but that is where the Home Secretary sought to pull the wool over our eyes. In no response to the consultation was it assumed that first-time offenders would be involved. It was always assumed that more than one offence would be needed; it was never assumed that the number would be as few as two. That was how the Home Secretary managed to pull the wool over all our eyes.

Paul Goggins: The hon. Lady talks about assumptions, and she previously gave us a number of quotes, which I shall come to shortly, in relation to the consultation.

Only when someone commits a second endorsable road traffic offence within three years will they become liable to pay the surcharge, and the regulations will make it clear that the further road traffic offence must be endorsable. Let us be clear what we mean when we talk about endorsable motoring offences. We are not talking about people who have a brake light out, people who park on the hard shoulder or those who do not have a working car horn. Those offences are not endorsable.

We are talking about people who, for example, travel at 50 mph in a 30 mph zone; people who go through red traffic lights, endangering people's lives; and people who overtake on pedestrian crossings. Those are endorsable offences, and they are very serious matters indeed. That is why introducing the surcharge after the second endorsable offence is a fair method. Drivers will receive a warning. If they offend again, they will be required to pay the surcharge. Whatever the outcome of the Department for Transport's review of penalty points, it will be clear that the second endorsable offence, not the value of the penalty points, will attract the surcharge. The number of occasions on which an offence is committed will be considered.

Amendment No. 65 would completely remove those who commit serious and persistent road traffic offences from liability for the surcharge. Under amendment No. 11, the surcharge could be applied only to someone who had been disqualified from driving. Both those amendments would smash into the provisions as currently drafted.

Sometimes in debates in the House and in conversations outside it is suggested that, somehow, people who commit an endorsable motoring offence are not really offenders. They are offenders, and many people commit such serious offences. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) cited several responses to the consultation and I read a comment in this morning's newspapers by a spokesman for the motoring lobby describing speeding as a "victimless crime". In some senses, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) echoed that sentiment. How can it be argued that a speeding motorist commits a victimless crime? Speeding contributes to 36,000 serious injuries a year, and people who speed cause 3,400 fatalities on our roads every year. Some 85 per cent. of people who are hit by motor vehicles travelling at 40 mph are killed. The impact on a pedestrian is a third greater if the speed of a vehicle increases from 30 to 35 mph. These are serious matters.

Mr. Llwyd: Will the Minister explain what the Home Secretary meant when he said on Second Reading that he would consider introducing "a levy of £10 on fixed penalty notices for serious repeat offenders, as opposed to general fixed penalty notices"?

That does not seem to be what the Minister is saying. The Home Secretary went on to say:

"We will link the levy to the higher number of points added to people's licences, so the system will be fair to everybody."—[Official Report, 14 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 540.]

The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I did not think that higher points were applied to fixed penalty notices by definition—that is complete nonsense.

Paul Goggins: The important part of my right hon. Friend's comments is the word "repeat". He was rightly making the point that the scheme would apply if a person committed an endorsable offence a further time. The provision sends the important message that we want to reduce the incidence of speeding and road traffic offences, and the impact that such offences have on victims.

Mrs. Gillan: I am beginning to get really worried. I understood that the surcharge would go into a victims fund to be spent on victims generally. The Minister now says that the surcharge is supposed to hit motorists hard to stop them speeding. He cannot have it both ways. Is the surcharge a revenue-raising measure for the victims fund, or another attack on motorists using a heavy-handed tool to try to bring them in line?

Paul Goggins: It is possible to achieve both things. The surcharge will help victims, and if motorists pay attention to the message that goes out and fewer of them are caught speeding, there will be fewer victims of speeding. The hon. Lady suggests that there is a contradiction, but both benefits are possible, so that is not the case. If the accusation is that we are surcharging offenders to provide additional support to victims, I am happy to plead guilty. It is important for people who commit such serious offences to support victims in the way we suggest.

We are responding to organisations such as Greater Manchester police, who do a good job policing my constituency and many others. I do not think that the scheme will be a nice little earner, as it has been described today. The money raised will go to the victims fund. That will be welcomed by the victims of not only motoring offences but sexual offences and domestic violence, about whom we talked earlier.

The Bill allows us to convert fines and surcharges into work; the enabling powers are included in the Courts Act 2003, although they are still being piloting. We intend to convert fines to work only if there is absolutely no other way of extracting the money from an offender.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham was right to cite £1.6 million as the cost of administering the fund, but that will be the cost of administering the whole fund, not just the bit relating to motoring offences, so the money will pay for a larger administrative task than she might have thought. Of course we will bear down on the cost of administration when we can, but we think that the administrative costs are worth bearing in pursuit of our objective.

I do not think that I will persuade the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham to change his mind. Some parts of the Bill apply to England and Wales and others apply to Northern Ireland. There are varying powers in various parts of the Bill. On the negative procedure, the powers in section 53 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 are not used in secret, even if they are employed by negative resolution. There is a responsibility under section 88 of the 1988 Act to consult representative organisations when secondary legislation is made. That consultation will take place.

There has been considerable debate about how we define the word "persistent" and what we mean by the word "repeat". Frankly, twice is once too many. The issue is deeply serious. If someone who travels at 50 mph in a 30 mph zone twice in three years or who goes through a red light and then overtakes on a pedestrian crossing twice in three years merely faces a modest surcharge on their fixed penalty notice, and not the consequences that could have arisen had they knocked down a child or severely injured someone, that is a price worth paying.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister knows that if the police consider that the facts surrounding a speeding offence are such that the person should be brought before the court rather than receive a fixed penalty notice, they have the power to do that. By the very action of issuing and agreeing to a fixed penalty notice, the police signify that they consider the offence to be at the bottom end of seriousness; otherwise, the fixed penalty notice would not operate.

Paul Goggins: The hon. Gentleman knows the arguments on fixed penalty notices. Part of the reason for them is to deliver fast and efficient justice, but of course people can be prosecuted and taken to court if the circumstances demand it.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Will the Minister consider the situation, which is not untypical, although I cannot claim to have been involved in it myself, of someone who commits two offences or is given two tickets on the same day and on the same stretch of road because he has triggered a camera twice, as opposed to the scenario that he describes? How can that be called a persistent offence?

Paul Goggins: Because he has done it twice. We have discussed whether persistent means twice or more often, but twice is once too often, whether it is on the same day or over a period of three years. If all someone has at the end of committing those serious offences is a small surcharge, and not the consequence of knocking down and killing a child, he has got off lightly. Having said that, I ask for the amendment to be withdrawn.

Mrs. Gillan: I feel a bit sorry for the Minister because he put up a bit of a fight, but his position is indefensible, and he knows it. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) was right in what he said in support of the amendments and I invite him to join us in the Lobby—or perhaps he will invite us to join him in the Lobby if I withdraw amendment No. 65 and allow amendment No. 11 to stand as our test.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) made his usual valuable contribution to the passage of legislation. Frankly, the Minister is trying to get at the lower end of the scale because that is where the volume and numbers are and where the money can be raked in. The points about no relationship between the quality of the offence and the fund were valid.

The Minister ignored our concerns about the negative resolution. The proposal imposes taxation without limit and representation.

There is no safeguard on the level at which the Government could set the fine. The Minister failed to address my point that the Home Secretary said that the surcharge would be £10, whereas he himself said that it would be £5. There is already confusion about the proposal before we have even reached square one.

4.45 pm

A Government who ignore the views of the Police Federation, the Magistrates Association, various police forces and motorists' organisations should think twice. Speeding fines are widely viewed as stealth taxes and are not always a means of improving road safety. Indeed, the revenue generated from motorists is not put towards road safety. Very little of the income generated by fines for motoring offences or duties on vehicle excise, fuel and insurance is spent on road safety or even on the general upkeep of roads. The motorist is therefore already getting poor value for money from the Government, even before this new stealth tax is introduced. The majority of people who will pay into the victims fund are otherwise law-abiding individuals. With the possible exception of the driver who went down the road and triggered a camera twice, they are tax and insurance-paying motorists. They have been caught in the headlights of the Minister and the Home Secretary, who think that they have a captive audience. Ministers are leading the fatted lamb to the slaughter, and once again they believe that the motorist can pay for other people's crimes. The criminals are laughing, but the motorists have been caught, so I urge my hon. Friends and other Members to join us in the Lobby and vote against this preposterous measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady intends to withdraw amendment No. 65.

Mrs. Gillan: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 11, in page 10, line 29, leave out from 'driving' to end of line 31.—[Mr. Heath.]

Clause 17

APPLICATION BY PROSECUTION FOR CERTAIN COUNTS TO BE TRIED WITHOUT A JURY

Mr. Heath: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 11, line 32 leave out subsection (9).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 33.

Amendment No. 9, in page 11, line 34 leave out 'and' and insert—

> '(b) evidence in respect of each count is admissible at the trial of the sample count, and'.

Mr. Heath: We now move on to trial by jury of sample counts. The debate in Committee was slightly confused—I rarely accuse the Solicitor-General of being confused, but some of her responses to my points were confused—and the confusion lay in the difference between the conditions in clause 17. A court would apply those conditions to determine whether it is appropriate to deal with sample counts, and some of us feel that the definition in subsection (9) is incomplete.

In Committee, the Solicitor-General was at pains to tell me that it is important that all the conditions are fulfilled, and I agree with that point. Subsection (2) identifies that the conditions must be fulfilled. Subsection (3) states:

> "The first condition is that the number of counts included in the indictment is likely to mean that a trial by jury involving all of those counts would be impracticable."

Subsection (4) states:

> "The second condition is that, if an order under subsection (2) were made, each count or group of counts which would accordingly be tried with a jury can be regarded as a sample of counts which could accordingly be tried without a jury."

Subsection (5) states:

> "The third condition is that it is in the interests of justice for an order under subsection (2) to be made."

Those conditions are perfectly proper.

Subsection (9) contains an almost redundant definition of what might be a sample count under clause 17. If we treat it as a definition, the missing ingredient is a provision on cross-admissibility. Such a provision was inserted in another place and removed by the Government in Committee, and I seek to reinsert it through amendment No. 9, which I intend to press to a Division at this debate's conclusion if the Government do not accept it.

Amendment No. 8 would delete subsection (9). To some extent, it is a facetious amendment because I do not necessarily want to do without definition. However, it is better to have no definition than incomplete definition. If we are interested in making proper law, the definition should be complete. In Committee, the Solicitor-General said that a judge would understand what it meant. Perhaps that is the case, but why do not we write it in bold in the Bill so that everybody understands it and there is no room for misunderstanding? If we are to have a definition, let it be complete; if it is not complete, let us do without it.

A more satisfactory answer was provided in another place through an amendment supported by Liberal Democrat and Conservative peers. I note that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and his colleagues have been happy to add their names to amendment No. 9. It simply states what we expect of cross-admissibility. It would insert a new paragraph (b), which states that

> "evidence in respect of each count is admissible at the trial of the sample count".

The point is important and cannot simply be ignored. It would be helpful if the Solicitor-General accepted that even at this late stage. If she does not, I suspect that we will debate the matter again in the future. I do not especially want to press for the removal of subsection (9), although I shall consider that option in the light of the Government's response. It would be far better to have a complete definition.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) knows from our debates in Committee that the official Opposition's view was that, although the Government had the justification for introducing clause 17 of trying to simplify the trial process in cases of a multitude of identical counts by enabling some to be tried as sample counts and the others either to be taken into consideration, or, if the defendant refused, to be tried without a jury, we were worried when we read how far the definition of "sample" could be extended. The Government's introduction of subsection (9) highlights the fact that, although in my experience as a practitioner, the use of the term "sample count" is common at the Bar, it has not been subject to legal definition. Subsection (9) tries to provide that definition.

The definition begins with the bizarre statement that "the defendant in respect of each count is the same person".

I should hope so, otherwise we would be in a strange world. It continues by saying that a count is to be regarded as a sample if "the judge considers that the sample count is a sample of the other counts."

I have great faith in our judiciary but not to the extent that Parliament should avoid providing it with guidance if we have a clear view of what constitutes a sample count.

Let me give an example of a sample count. A defendant steals a credit card and uses it 50 times. Each time, he obtains property by deception. Instead of charging him with 50 offences—that would lead to a long, complicated and rather ponderous trial—he would be charged with one count for the first time he used the card to obtain property, another count for the last time and perhaps two or three other counts to cover the period when the offences were taking place. I am content with the notion that, if, at the end of the trial on those counts, the defendant did not accept having the others taken into consideration, it would be proper to say that there had been a trial of the sample and the judge could deal with the others. I fear, however, that under subsection (9) as it is currently drafted, it would be possible for the scope of a sample count to be considerably widened.

This matter was considered in great detail in the other place, and an amendment to the Bill was passed—I think that it was a very good one—to ensure that in any case involving sample counts, the defining element linking them all together would be that

"evidence in respect of each count is admissible at the trial of the sample count".

That principle is well known in our legal system, and it seems completely to address the vagueness that might otherwise result from subsection (9).

I join the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome in saying—and I am sorry to have to say it—that no adequate explanation was provided in Committee as to why amendment No. 9, on which I hope that we shall be able to vote, would somehow wreck this part of the Bill. I was mystified by the fact that the only argument being put forward was that we did not need proposed new paragraph (b), as shown in amendment No. 9, because a judge would be able to deal with the matter quite satisfactorily.However, the Solicitor-General cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Hogg: Might I suggest a reason why this proposal might create a difficulty? If the evidence is mutually admissible, the fact of a conviction in the trial before a jury would be admissible in evidence in the trial without a jury. As we all know, once someone has a previous conviction, their chances of getting an acquittal are greatly diminished.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a good point, although it is also right to point out that from December, the operation of the new rules under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 will completely change the position in respect of the admissibility of previous convictions. It is certainly envisaged that, in this scheme of things, the same judge who tried the previous matter with a jury would subsequently try the other counts—if they were not accepted—without a jury.

At this stage of the Bill's passage, we can only do our best to rectify its worst mischiefs. In amendment No. 9, we are seeking to ensure that a sample count involves what the majority of legal practitioners would understand a sample count to be. For that reason, we support the intention to put the amendment to the vote. In the meantime, I shall be interested to hear from the Minister an explanation as to why it would do so much damage to the main thrust of clause 17.

Mr. Hogg: Before we hear the answers from the Minister or the Solicitor-General, might I rise briefly to make my points? Personally, I would prefer the removal of the definition for the perverse reason that it would make it less likely that a judge would exercise the powers provided by clause 17, because I am deeply disturbed by those powers. I do not see the justification for them. I am keeping firmly to order in this matter, Mr. Deputy Speaker. To start off with, if a judge had this power—even if it were modified by subsection (9) as amended—there would be a tendency for them to overload the indictment. If lots of counts can be put into the indictment, they will be, and that is bad news.

Secondly, and quite differently, the courts already have the power to deal with the matter on the sentence. The prosecution will simply say to the trial judge, "My Lord, you know that this is a sample count in respect of which a conviction has taken place." In all probability, the trial judge will have the power to impose an appropriate sentence. I therefore find it difficult to see why we should have the powers set out in clause 17 at all. If we removed the definition in subsection (9), as proposed in the amendment, the trial judge would be less likely to invoke the clause 17 powers.My first argument, therefore, is to ask whether the clause 17 powers are desirable. If the answer to that is no, I shall be in favour of removing the definition, because that would be one way of making it less likely that a judge would use those powers.

5.15 pm

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): I will be asking the House to support Government amendment No. 33 and to resist amendments Nos. 8 and 9. Perhaps it will assist the House if I briefly explain what these clauses are designed to do. Their purpose is to establish a two-stage procedure to provide in statute for the replacement of the sample count procedure that was formerly used in cases where an alleged offence has been repeated many times against a series of victims. Because there is a limit to the number of counts that can be reasonably included in a single indictment, the practice used to be for a defendant to be indicted for a number of sample counts, and then, if he was convicted on the sample count, to be sentenced on the basis of all the offences. However, this practice was disapproved by the Court of Appeal in a case called Kidd in 1998, on the grounds that it involved sentencing an offender for offences to which he had not pleaded guilty, of which he had not been convicted, and which he had not agreed to be taken into consideration. So we had a long-standing sample count procedure, with which everyone will be familiar, and that was disallowed in 1998 in the Kidd case.

The court's decision in Kidd was no doubt correct, but the result is that in cases of multiple offences, it is no longer possible for the court to take account of more than a fraction of the defendant's offending when sentencing him, even if he is convicted of all the counts on the indictment. For example, where the offending consists of a scam in which hundreds of victims are cheated of small sums of money, the proceeds of the offences represented by the counts on the indictment could only amount to a tiny fraction of the total sum that was defrauded.

The result is a threefold problem. First, the sentence will not necessarily be able to reflect the totality of the offending. Secondly—this is important as well—most victims will be denied the satisfaction of knowing that the defendant has been dealt with for the offence committed against them. Thirdly, where there has been no conviction, the court has no power to award compensation, so that victims may miss out on compensation where their case was one of the offences that could not be accommodated on the indictment. So yes, there is the sentencing point, but there are two further points as well.

Even where the individual offences are more serious, such as indecent assaults, and the court is able to impose an adequate sentence simply on the basis of the limited counts on the indictment, it will still appear to the victim that the accused has been dealt with for only part of his offending. So convicting multiple offenders of all their offences is important. The objective of the present clauses is to provide the courts with a replacement for the sample count arrangements that would have been used before Kidd ruled them out.

Mr. Hogg: Will the Solicitor-General address in due course—not necessarily immediately—the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) about the mode of trial? Is he right to say that it is intended that the trial judge in the first trial, who has heard all the evidence and knows the facts of the conviction, should then be the presiding judge in the second trial, held without a jury, because in that case you will have a single judge, without a jury, who already knows of all the facts of the previous convictions?

The Solicitor-General: Well, if that is the case—and it is most likely to be the case—that makes it more like the procedure that used to obtain before Kidd, with which the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is no doubt wholly familiar and to which he no doubt had no objections. The House needs to understand and accept that this is a tightening of safeguards compared with the pre-Kidd situation, not a loosening of them. The objective of the current clauses is to provide the courts with a replacement for the sample count arrangements that they would have used before Kidd ruled them out. We do not wish to go further than that, nor do we believe that we have done so.

These clauses introduce a new procedure and provide safeguards. I want to take the House through those 10 safeguards.

First, when the new procedure is used, only when the defendant has been convicted by the jury of the sample counts can the judge proceed to consider whether the defendant is guilty of offences not before the jury. Therefore, if the defendant is acquitted: end of story. There is no opportunity in the procedure for the jury to acquit and for the judge then to come along and convict on the sample counts. That is an important first safeguard and the effect of clause 19(1).

Secondly, the judge must be satisfied that the counts that the jury would try can be regarded as a sample of the counts that would be tried by him in the second stage, which is the effect of clause 17(4). I guess that that is the nearest that we come to a definition, which is that the judge must be satisfied that those are indeed sample counts.

Mr. Grieve: Government amendment No. 33 appears to remove the requirement in subsection (9) that the judge should consider that the sample count is a sample of the other counts. Therefore, I hope that when the Solicitor-General comes to deal with that, she will explain where the requirement lies that the judge should consider it as a sample.

The Solicitor-General: The requirement lies in clause 17(4), which I have just dealt with.

The third safeguard is that the judge must be satisfied that it would be impractical for a jury to try all the counts. That is in clause 17(3). The first impulse must therefore be jury trial. But that is still not enough—there is a further safeguard, which is the fourth one.

Mr. Heath: I appreciate that there are six more safeguards to go, but I am going to take the Solicitor-General back one. I want to be absolutely clear on the point raised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) about Government amendment No. 33 removing the condition in clause 17(9)(b) that the judge considers that the sample count is a sample of the other counts. What is the subtle distinction that I have missed between the judge considering that each count or group of counts

"can be regarded as a sample of counts",

under clause 17(4), and

"is a sample of the other counts", under clause 17(9)(b), which is now to be removed?

The Solicitor-General: The point is that clause 17(9)(b) was simply repetitive and added nothing to clause 17(4), which is the second condition, as described in the Bill, which says that it must be regarded as a sample of counts.

The fourth safeguard is that the judge, having decided that the first impulse—jury trial of all the issues—would be impractical for some issues, would have to be satisfied that there are not other steps that could be taken to facilitate a trial by jury. That is the effect of clause 17(6).

The fifth safeguard is that the judge must be satisfied that it is in the interests of justice for the two-stage procedure to be used. That is under clause 17(5).

The sixth safeguard is that the defendant tried by the judge on the sample and remaining counts must be the same person. That is the effect both of clause 17(9) and of our proposed amendment to it. We ask the House to reject amendment No. 8 and to support Government amendment No. 33.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If, in the view of the defence, the judge has misdirected himself, what steps can the defence take to suggest that it should be a jury rather than a non-jury trial?

The Solicitor-General: That relates to the seventh and eighth safeguards if I remember the correct order. I shall come to them and the process by which challenges can be made.

I was dealing with the sixth safeguard, which is that it must be the same defendant on the sample of the remaining counts to be tried by the judge. That is the effect of clause 17(9) and our proposed amendment to it. Our amendment removes the circular definition that was criticised in Committee and simply provides that a sample count is not to be regarded as a sample of other counts unless the defendant in respect of each count is the same person.

Seventhly, there is also the safeguard laid out in rule 9 of the indictment rules, which will apply. All the offences must be founded on the same facts or form part of a series of offences of the same or similar character.

The next safeguard addresses the point raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed). The defence will have the opportunity to make representations against the use of the procedure if they want to challenge it. That is provided for in clause 18(4).

Mr. Grieve: I do not draw reassurance from the suggestion that rule 9 of the indictment rules is sufficient in such a case. Is it not a fact that if that were the only safeguard, it would be possible to have one of a series of counts of completely separate incidents of burglary that took place within a short time going to jury trial with the others determined afterwards? That is not what I originally understood the Home Secretary to say when he put forward the proposal for introducing the mechanism of clause 17 when he made his announcement at the end of proceedings on the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

The Solicitor-General: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It would not be satisfactory if the only protection were rule 9 of the indictment rules. It is not the only protection; it is an additional protection. There are nine others. I ask him and the House to consider them altogether.

Mr. Grieve: I am sorry to intervene again, but I come back to the definition of "a sample count". I would be interested to hear whether the Solicitor-General can give the House the definition as she understands it. Obviously it may just have its ordinary dictionary definition but if that is the only definition that we have, insufficient safeguards are available to ensure that it is not simply used to avoid jury trial on quite separate offences.

The Solicitor-General: I think that there are sufficient safeguards and the Law Commission is satisfied that, with these 10 conditions and safeguards, the situation will be fair. The hon. Gentleman keeps rising to his feet and saying, "But this is not fair", but I have not even got to the end of my list. We are using both belt and braces, with many safeguards in place. I imagine that most members of the judiciary think that they are entirely unnecessary on account of the fact that the judiciary would probably argue that it knows what is and is not a sample. The defence can challenge the decision and appeal if necessary. However, we are not leaving it at that. We are putting in place all the safeguards.

As I say, the defence will have the opportunity to make representations and if it does not accept the judge's ruling, it will be able to appeal against his decision to use the procedure. That is the effect of clause 18(5). Not only will the defence have the opportunity to make representations, but it will be able to appeal and article 6 of the European convention, which is the tenth safeguard, will apply to guarantee a fair trial.

On the basis of the safeguards, the Law Commission is happy. I ask the House to reject the amendments Nos. 8 and 9, but to support Government amendment No. 33.

5.30 pm

Mr. Heath: The Solicitor-General's remarks have underlined the tortuousness of the process. She has made it more difficult, not easier, to understand what is intended. The precautions that she has outlined—the 10 steps—do not make sense. We feel that we must press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Jim Murphy and
Ms Bridget Prentice

Question accordingly negatived.

Amendment made: No. 33, in page 11, line 32 , leave out from 'count' to end of line 36 and insert

'may not be regarded as a sample of other counts unless the defendant in respect of each count is the same person'.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Clause 22

PROCEDURE FOR DETERMINING FITNESS TO PLEAD: ENGLAND AND WALES

Mr. Grieve: I beg to move amendment No. 67, in page 13, line 24, leave out Clause 22.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 68, in page 37, line 8, at end insert—

'This subsection does not apply to the amendment in paragraph 60 of Schedule 10 (which accordingly extends to England and Wales only)'.'.

Mr. Grieve: We now come to a part of the Bill that has caused me considerable concern. The Government propose to reform the rules under which unfitness to plead and insanity are determined. At present, the determination of whether a person is fit to plead is made by a jury. If there is a question about fitness to plead, a jury is empanelled for the specific purpose of deciding the matter. In my professional experience as a barrister, I can remember no occasion on which that procedure took a long time, or on which the jury encountered difficulty in reaching a correct decision. However, the Government propose to remove that power from a judge and jury, and to leave the decision to a judge alone.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree that that is so only in part? Clause 22(5) preserves the jury's right to determine the matter when it arises post-arraignment. In other words, the Government accept that the jury is competent to perform the task.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a very good point.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree, therefore, that it is incumbent on the Government to present evidence on the general point, and to apply the method of difference to explain why different regimes should apply pre and post- arraignment?

Mr. Grieve: My hon. Friend is right. If no one has questioned the fact that the jury should continue to play such an important role post-arraignment, why should that role be removed from the jury pre-arraignment?

I am afraid that the Government have a long history of disliking jury trials. The Government showed their hand very clearly in previous statutory attempts to curb jury trial. They believe that jury trial is an inconvenience that must be tolerated at best because of some unfortunate public adherence to its principles. There really is nothing more to this. If the Home Secretary had had his way in the Criminal Justice Act 2003, he would have removed jury trial for a raft of substantive offences, and the Government have made earlier attempts to do the same thing.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): In what percentage of cases is fitness to plead an issue?

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. Friend asks an interesting question to which, I am afraid, I do not have the precise answer—the Minister may well be able to provide one—but I can say that fitness to plead is an issue in a tiny percentage of the total number of cases tried.

Mr. Hogg: I imagine that my hon. Friend would also want to say that the same kind of issue arises in quite a lot of cases—for example, with regard to diminished responsibility, to the defence of insanity and to the question of special reasons when a defendant chooses not to give evidence.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend is correct, so we are dealing with what appears to be a discrete issue in relation to unfitness to plead and insanity.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I wonder whether my hon. Friend thinks that possibly money might be behind this plan? If the Government put the measure in place pre-arraignment, they would save the cost of empanelling the jury. I wonder whether that could be a factor.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. Friend may be right, but we have not heard sufficient explanation from the Government about their rationale. Indeed, I hope that we will have the opportunity this evening—admittedly, at a late stage in the passage of a Bill—to hear a full explanation of why the Government think that this is the correct action to take.

Vera Baird: This issue arises in only a small percentage of cases, but in about 90 per cent. of the ones in which it does there is no dispute—both sides experts agree that the person is unfit to plead—yet the current law still requires a jury to be sworn in, which is an utter waste of money.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. and learned Lady, as she often does, makes an important point. I can only speak to the amendment, but I am aware that she has an alternative way to meet the problem: where agreement is reached on unfitness to plead, there is no need to empanel a jury, but where a dispute arises, which happens in very few cases, a jury should be empanelled. That goes a very long way to meeting my anxieties.

My basic anxiety is that this is not an issue of administrative convenience. Clause 22 can cut two ways. First, some people may seek to masquerade behind unfitness to plead to avoid the consequences of a conviction against them because they think that that might be to their advantage. Secondly—I do not think that this is too far fetched, but I hope that it never happens—there may be instances where getting someone declared to be effectively insane and unable to stand trial is convenient to an authoritarian state. That has certainly happened in other countries. That is another reason why it is important that the issue should be determined by a jury if it is in dispute.

Mr. Hogg: Is there not is another important reason? If a person is found unfit to plead, section 5 powers under the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 come into effect and orders that are analogous to hospital orders may be made. In other words, serious sanctions can be placed on a person who is found unfit to plead, which is surely a matter to be left to a jury.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend is quite right, and that was precisely the reason why I said that authoritarian states have found it convenient to lock people up on the basis that they are insane without trial or due process. We might be a million miles from that happening in this country, but it is wise for Parliament to guard against anything that could tend to take us down that road.

I do not wish to take up too much of the House's time, so I simply say to the Minister that I cannot understand why we are doing this. As a conservative with a small c as well as a large C, my attitude is that if something does not require reform, there is no earthly reason why we should tinker with it. The likely amounts of time and cost that will be incurred by preserving the existing system would be negligible. Inasmuch as there is a feeling that change should take place, the view taken by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) that the right of determination by a jury should be preserved when there is a dispute would be a better approach than that adopted by the Government.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am afraid to tell my hon. Friend that the more I listen to his argument, the more I conclude that the Redcar solution, if I may call it that, appears to be better than his. Why did he not table an amendment in those terms?

Mr. Grieve: I had not fully appreciated the solution proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar at the time at which amendment No. 67 was tabled. My right hon. Friend will notice that the amendment would simply delete clause 22 entirely. Our approach says that we do not need to tinker with this aspect of the law. I shall invite the House to divide on the amendment unless the Minister can exercise colossal persuasion on me to take a contrary view because I do not think that it is an inappropriate way of dealing with the matter. However, the Bill still has to go back to the other place, which is where its passage started. The Government may well defeat us this evening, but if they consider that the hon. and learned Lady's suggestion has merit, they will have the opportunity to accept the proposal—the Minister could do so this evening, I suppose—and the extent of the disagreement between us would be greatly reduced.

Mr. Boswell: On a somewhat different yet related point, I note that my hon. Friend's amendment applies to clause 22. However, clause 23 provides for what I construe to be a parallel procedure for Northern Ireland, although that clause will amend an order. Will he clarify his thinking about that? Does he think that it would be appropriate to have a common arrangement throughout the various parts of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Grieve: If my hon. Friend reads amendment No. 68, which is linked to amendment No. 67, he will note that it says:

> "This subsection does not apply to the amendment in paragraph 60 of Schedule 10 (which accordingly extends to England and Wales only)".

I hope that that answers his question.

We want the Government to give us a proper explanation of why the procedure should be changed. I am wholly unconvinced and do not think that we are discussing an exercise in semantics. Important decisions, such as a person's fitness to plead, should be determined in our legal system by a jury, especially if that is a matter of dispute. Unless the Minister can persuade me to the contrary, I shall press the amendment to a Division.

Mr. Hogg: I support the observations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). It is important to bear it in mind that a disability applicable to clause 22 has a fairly wide meaning. Insanity is covered, of course, but so are deafness and the fact that someone is dumb. The provision extends to circumstances in which it is thought that a defendant is incapable of giving instructions to his or her legal team. One also needs to keep it in mind that juries have to address similar issues in many circumstances that are not unlike what we are contemplating. For example, if the question of diminished responsibility is raised in cases of alleged murder, juries have to address technical questions not unlike those that arise in cases of an unfitness plea. That is also true when the defence of insanity is raised because that, too, has to be addressed by a jury.

I refer my hon. Friend to a further range of cases in which a defendant refuses or declines to give evidence. It can then be asserted that there are good reasons for that, and that person's failure to give evidence should not be held against him by reason of those good reasons. In that class of case, the jury often has to determine whether the reasons were good, which often relates to the mental state of the defendant. So the jury already has to consider technical questions in many cases.

Indeed, the Government cannot say that a jury is incapable of addressing those questions because subsection (5) of clause 22 preserves the role of the jury in those cases when the question of fitness to plead arises after arraignment. In those cases, the Government have said in terms that the question is to be determined by the trial jury. So just pause for a moment: it cannot be asserted that a jury is incapable of dealing with the question because the Government say that it is to be dealt with by the jury in post-arraignment cases, and in the other cases those questions have to be determined by a jury, so why the change, given that it cannot be the incompetence of a jury to determine the issue?

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) may have identified both the cause and the solution. I am prepared to accept that there is agreement in the great majority of cases between the Crown and the defence teams on unfitness to plead. Incidentally, that does not conclude the issue because a judge, for example, might decide that the Crown and the defence teams are wrong. I have encountered—although I do not think that I ever personally appeared in—circumstances in which that has arisen.

The hon. and learned Lady's solution is attractive, but there probably should be a discretion for the judge to order a jury trial if he thinks that the consensus between the Crown and defence is unsound or needs to be tested. Although the Redcar solution has huge attractions, it should be underpinned by a discretion on the part of the judge to order a jury trial on that issue of fitness to plead if for other reasons he thinks that that is appropriate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield asked why we are going down this road. In part, it may be because it will save money. That is not an unworthy motive and is addressed by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, but I am concerned that we should not diminish jury trials arbitrarily. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said that the jury trial is under attack by the Government. Indeed, it is even under attack within the Bill, at clause 17, which we debated. I do not want to attack it.

It is also important to keep in mind the point that I made to my hon. Friend. Under clause 24, if a person is found to be under a disability—according to the Government's position that will be decided by the trial judge—it falls to the court in appropriate circumstances to impose various orders in respect of the defendant, including hospital orders, supervision orders and treatment orders. If the Government's position remains unchanged, the question of fitness to plead will be determined by the judge alone. That may lead to the introduction of a number of orders, which can be used to deprive a defendant of his or her liberty, and I simply do not like that.

Mr. Llwyd: To reinforce the powerful and valuable point that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is making, some of those orders can be made for an indeterminate period.

Mr. Hogg: Indeed. If you will forgive me, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall pursue that. I was Under-Secretary at the Home Office very many years ago, and was involved in decisions about when individuals detained in special hospitals should be released. I therefore know that it is extremely difficult to determine whether someone held in a special hospital is sufficiently safe to be allowed back into the community. I therefore echo the point made by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd)—the power of a judge sitting alone to impose a sentence or order following his adjudication about fitness to stand trial could result in a patient being held for a long time in a special hospital, because people are sensitive about the risk of discharging them.

Vera Baird: I am flattered that the right hon. and learned Gentleman finds the Redcar solution attractive, but he is going slightly over the top. Two psychiatrists on opposite sides in a case may agree that someone is not fit to plead. Indeed, in cases that I have handled, four or even more psychiatrists have reached such an agreement. In those circumstances, why would we need a jury? I urge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to consider that somebody in the community can be sectioned by two doctors—we do not have a jury to rubber-stamp that decision.

Mr. Hogg: That is a perfectly fair point, but may I mention the name "Saunders" to the hon. and learned Lady? She will remember that there was extensive agreement that Mr. Saunders was suffering from advancing dementia. As I recall, the Court of Appeal decided that his illness was so advanced that he should not be held in custody. I believe that that gentleman has now made a remarkable recovery. Sometimes, the experts can get it wrong, and in cases where the trial judge smells a rat he may think that the issue should be determined by a jury.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. and learned Friend will know that I am a lay person, so I defer to his legal expertise in this matter. I do not wish make any claims of my own, but the issue of detention and process is important. He will have studied the recent law report on the Bournewood judgment in the European Court of Human Rights. The court, in its wisdom, found both the Government and British legal procedures defective, as people were held without their consent, which they were not capable of giving, and were effectively detained without due process. Is it not incumbent on us, therefore, to get the process absolutely right?

Mr. Hogg: I am sure that we need to do so but, to address the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, in many cases, perhaps even the great majority, there is not any dispute about the extent of the disability. In such cases, I accept that a jury should not be empanelled. I do not, however, accept that that conclusion is appropriate when there is a serious dispute. In any event, there should be discretion, even when the experts on both sides are in agreement, to hold a jury trial and have a proper adjudication if the judge thinks fit. If I continue speaking, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall repeat my argument, so I shall conclude.

Mr. Greg Knight: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The House faces a dilemma. The more we listen to the debate, the clearer it becomes that the mood of the House is in sympathy with the amendment suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), which is not before us. Would you be prepared to accept a manuscript amendment on the basis of the amendment suggested by the hon. and learned Lady?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says. However, the debate is timed and there are just 20 minutes to go before the debate reaches its conclusion.

Mr. Heath: What a shame it is that we have such a restrictive timetable that we are not able properly to debate matters before us in this important Bill. It illustrates the difficulties that we face. When the point of order was raised, I had high hopes that there might be a way of considering the sensible suggestion from the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I noted carefully the Minister's response to it, which seemed positive, judging from his body language. He was writing away. It is not unknown for Ministers to make important announcements very late in the proceedings on a Bill. Some of us might have considered this a perfect opportunity for him to announce that he was proposing to make an amendment to the Bill—one which, for once, many of us would find entirely suitable and proper.

Vera Baird: May I make it clear, first, that I have not proposed an amendment either now or in Committee and, secondly, that I made the suggestion in July or thereabouts, so there has been ample time for anyone else to table an amendment along those lines if they wanted to do so? It is hardly fair to blame the Minister for the fact that the Opposition did not table an amendment.

Mr. Heath: We are always careful not to tread on each other's toes by taking amendments that other hon. Members suggested. It is not at all good parliamentary procedure. Let us return to the case in point. We are seeking to address the issue that the Government have put before us, which is—

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I feel obliged to point out, in respect of comments about pinching other people's amendments, that it was well established in Committee that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) was extremely sensitive on that topic, when there was any suggestion that anybody might be running with an amendment that she was interested in.

Mr. Heath: It is simply parliamentary good manners to recognise the provenance of amendments when they are discussed.

Vera Baird: I have never proposed an amendment on this issue. Can we be clear about that?

Mr. Heath: I am grateful for the clarification from the hon. and learned Lady. There is a difference between an amendment and a suggestion. I accept her point.

Mrs. Gillan rose—

Mr. Heath: I have made very little progress in what I intended to say, but I will give way, for the last time.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I wanted to intervene on his opening remarks, but events overtook me. I bemoan the fact that we do not have time to debate the Bill. As this may be my only opportunity, may I say how disappointed I am that we could not debate the two groups of amendments on domestic violence and restraining orders, especially those on domestic violence, which contain the precious provisions on the domestic violence advocacy service? I have therefore been even more alarmed at the sparsity—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Lady's disappointment, but we must return to the amendment under discussion.

Mr. Heath: Absolutely, Madam Deputy Speaker. We have not had the opportunity to discuss the points that the Government conceded in a couple of later amendments, which I would have welcomed.

There is a serious concern about what is to some extent an anodyne suggestion about fitness to plead. Somewhere deep within the recesses of the Home Office, there is a Department whose sole interest and mission is to find ways to reduce access to jury trial. Every single Home Office Bill that comes before us nibbles away a little bit more at the concept of recourse to jury trial in this country. Some hon. Members in all parts of the House, but particularly on the Opposition Benches, believe that jury trial has stood us well over the centuries and we wish to protect it. We have had to fight off such depredations time and again.

It may be that economic issues are involved and that it will be cheaper to proceed as the Government propose. It may be that the measure will make little difference in most cases, but there will be instances in which it does make a difference. Where there is dispute, as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar said in her suggestion that fell short of an amendment, it is appropriate that the case should be referred to a jury for the protection of the defendant and in the interests of justice.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said in what I thought was a very apposite contribution, the point is that we are not talking simply about the initial decision on fitness to plead in terms of the conduct of the criminal trial; we are talking about everything that flows from that in the future determination of what will happen to the individual concerned. That could, in effect, involve incarceration, albeit in the context of mental health treatment, and that could mean sine die if it happens. That is an important issue, and I believe that it is appropriate for a jury to be involved, which is the situation at the moment.

If we are to make this change, the Government must produce a very cogent reason as to why it is essential for us to do so. We have not heard that argument in Committee, on Second Reading or in the debates in another place. Indeed, those who were exercised about the issue in another place felt that the points that they were raising were simply not addressed by the Minister who responded to the debate.

The only assumption that we can make is that the provisions are part of the war of attrition against the process of jury trial that this Government have for some reason chosen to wage. That is not good enough reason. On the contrary, it is good enough reason in itself for us in this House to say no. Until and unless the Government produce arguments that what is proposed will not only be cheaper, but will improve the quality of justice in our courts, I think that we are entitled to take not just a sceptical attitude, but a hostile one, to something that is not of proven value.

When the Minister responds, I hope that he will do one of two things. He should either provide a definitive argument as to why the Government must have the measure at this time and what the benefits are—we have yet to hear such an argument—or say "No, we were clearly mistaken; there are better ways of doing this. The debate that we have heard has perhaps provided some signposts as to where that eventual resolution may come, and although we do not like making announcements at the end of proceedings in the later stages of a Bill's passage in the House of Commons, we will nevertheless give the matter careful consideration and table an appropriate amendment in another place, even at this late stage in the proceedings, and before the Bill comes back." That seems to me to be the right way of proceeding, and I hope that it is an avenue that he will consider.

Mrs. Gillan: It would be most appropriate if the Government were to agree to our requests and make the amendments in another place, where the noble Baroness Scotland of Asthal deployed the argument that to convene juries in such instances would be a waste of time and resources, which is not an adequate basis from which to advance the proposals.

Mr. Heath: The worst possible argument against having a jury in a trial is that it is a waste of time and resources. Those of us who are interested in the quality of justice and the process of our courts say that juries are not a waste of time and resources, but the bedrock on which the British system of justice is based, and we should not resile from that position.

Mr. Malins: As always, I declare an interest: I sit as a recorder of the Crown court and as a part-time district judge in the magistrates courts. My hon. Friends on the Front Bench have done the House a service by tabling the amendment, which addresses the important issue of fitness to plead. I am bound to say that the issue has not arisen very often—if at all—in my experience of magistrates courts. Of course, certain cases may only be tried summarily, so one can envisage a situation in which it might arise, but I have not come across it in some 10 years of part-time judicial sitting. That is not to say that mental health issues do not arise in those courts—they do—but I have not come across the issue of fitness to plead. I imagine that it occurs fairly infrequently in the Crown court and, as was said earlier, I imagine that in many such instances the Crown and the defence agree on the proper way forward.

When one deals with fitness to plead, one inevitably deals with a defendant who is, for one reason or another, vulnerable and who may need more protection than a less vulnerable defendant. So far as such a vulnerable defendant is concerned, the consequences of a finding and a disposal may be severe, which is a point that was made earlier in the debate. Such individuals may be detained for almost indefinite periods in very difficult situations, which is the point that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) made very well in his intervention a moment ago.

Vera Baird: I have not actively practised for some little time, but is it right that if a judge decides that someone is unfit to plead, they can automatically send them away? I think not. In that case, a second process is undergone to establish whether that person has committed the alleged acts that would form the crime, if they were not unfit to plead. A jury must hear the second stage, which it is not proposed to change.

Mr. Malins: Those who practise at the Crown court more than me will correct me. Disposals are available in such situations, and they involve the detention of the person concerned.

Mr. Llwyd: A jury is not required for the second stage referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). If evidence is given to the judge, it is sufficient for a hospital order to kick in, in which case a second jury is not required.

Mr. Malins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Let me move on. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) made the important point that clause 22 recognises and establishes the value of the jury. The Government propose that, pre-arraignment, the matter will be for the judge alone, but post-arraignment it will be a matter for the judge and jury. That recognises the value of the jury in certain circumstances, so the Government are not saying that the jury is not properly qualified. They are saying that, pre-arraignment, it will be a matter for the judge alone.

I am interested in the Government's reasons for their actions. So far, there has been no suggestion of the reasoning behind the proposal. It cannot be that the jury is not competent to determine the issue. It must therefore be to do with money. Earlier, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) referred to a statement in the other place about the reason having to do with time and resources. As I understand it, that means time and money. The Under-Secretary should tell us how many examples a year he envisages in the Crown court. How often will the provision be applied? He must have figures, otherwise he would not have made the proposal.

What is the cost of empanelling a jury? I do not believe that it is necessarily terribly expensive. Even if it were, surely the principle of what is just, right and in the interests of the person in the dock comes way ahead of financial considerations.

Mr. Llwyd: The Auld report referred to that. Its subtext was to smash away as many jury trials as possible.

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point. As well as the financial point, the provision may be a further attempt by the Government to reduce juries' influence in our legal system. I, for one, deplore it.

Mr. Greg Knight: I refer hon. Members to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

In most debates on new provisions, the proposer makes a case for change. Our problem, which the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome mentioned, is that we are operating in a vacuum to some extent because we have not yet heard what the Under-Secretary has to say. He has not sought to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, early in the debate to explain why he believes that the clause is necessary. The Government seek to remove a provision that has existed in our law for 40 years and the Under-Secretary therefore has to make a case for the change.

Subsection (5) reveals the reason for including the clause. It gives the game away, and it would appear that the reason centres on cost. As I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), I was increasingly attracted, if not to the "Redcar amendment"—the hon. and learned Lady claims that that does not exist—then to the "Redcar suggestion." I am reminded of the words of the late Lord Hailsham, who said:

> "Two heads are better than one even if they are sheep's heads."

I believe that 12 heads are better than one. As we do not have the option of voting for the Redcar amendment, I am happy to support amendment No. 67.

Paul Goggins: I have little time and I therefore want to make two or three simple and clear points. Clause 22 does not mean the erosion of trial by jury. In answer to several points, I emphasise that we propose that a judge makes the fitness to plead decision but that finding facts and ascertaining whether the defendant has committed the offence with which he has been charged is a matter for the jury, not the judge alone. We must be clear about that. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) read far more into clause 22 than is the case. The judge will determine fitness to plead and the jury will subsequently hear the case. It is important that that message is understood.

There is an issue about the effective use of court resources and we need to ensure that every jury is valued for the time that it can give. The provision is also in the interests of vulnerable defendants who currently undergo two lengthy processes whereby they have to listen to evidence from medical practitioners in the first hearing. And of course, if the defendant subsequently wishes to challenge the judge's finding, the judge must state his reasons to the court. The jury would not have to give their reasons, but the judge would. That would give grounds on which someone who was found unfit to plead could challenge the decision of the court.

The provision is a recommendation of Lord Justice Auld, and the recommendations are now four years old. We believe that the proposal is too important to the courts—and, indeed, to vulnerable defendants—to be delayed any further. It is time that we made progress—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

It being five and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question accordingly agreed to.

It being after Seven o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, pursuant to Order [this day].

Bill reported, with amendments; read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

7.1 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance in view of Mr. Speaker's ruling that important announcements on policy should first be made to this House. At 10.11 this morning, the Home Office put out a news bulletin entitled "Putting Victims First: the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill". It says:

> "The Home Secretary also announced today that the Government is setting up a review into the law on murder."

On the second page in notes to editors, it states:

> "The murder review was announced by the Home Secretary during the debate on the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill in the House of Commons today."

[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order.

Mr. Grieve: Madam Deputy Speaker, is it in order for the Home Secretary to make an announcement to the press that has not been preceded by an announcement to this House on a matter of such importance? Secondly, is it not misleading of the Home Secretary to suggest to any hon. Member—or, indeed, the press—who might read the statement that, notwithstanding his discourtesy in this matter, we were nevertheless going to hear from him during the course of our six-hour debate this afternoon? I seek your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker, on what can be done to ensure that announcements are made properly to this House and not through the device of being announced in the course of a debate to which they are not germane. What can Members of this House do to ensure that they are not misled by Government press notices suggesting that something is going to happen during the day when it either will not or cannot?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Home Secretary wishes to speak.

Mr. Blunkett: I may be able to help with the original point of order. It would have been perfectly feasible and possible for me to have made the announcement to the House had the Opposition not filibustered—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Outrageous!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. A point of order has been made, and the Home Secretary is speaking to it.

Mr. Blunkett: Had the Opposition not filibustered deliberately to wipe out the Third Reading—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blunkett: That was a calculated way of avoiding a Third Reading debate. I do not understand why

Opposition Members felt it necessary to do so and why they could not face me at the Dispatch Box—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Secretary Blunkett is responding to a point of order, and he is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Blunkett: Notwithstanding that, I apologise to the House for not having had the opportunity to address it on the issues that have been raised tonight. Had I had the opportunity to speak on Third Reading, and therefore to be challenged on this matter, I would have done so.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now proceed with the remaining business of the day.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this relevant to the matter at hand?

David Maclean: It is, Madam Deputy Speaker. We have all heard the Home Secretary accuse Opposition Members of the parliamentary abuse that is filibustering. That is an absolutely outrageous suggestion. [Interruption.] I understood that decisions on whether or not there has been filibustering are for the Chair alone to make. Have you, Madam Deputy Speaker, or any of your predecessors in the Chair today, heard anything at all that was out of order and which could be remotely connected with the abusive term "filibustering"?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, I am not taking any more points of order. If Mr. Speaker is not aware already of the disquiet in the House, I shall make sure that he is made aware of it, and of the comments that have been made.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): On a new point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this a new point of order?

Mr. Hogg: It is, Madam Deputy Speaker. [Interruption.] The Home Secretary has made it plain, very courteously, that he was going to tell us about the statement that he wanted to make in the Third Reading debate. Would it be possible to arrange that he make an early statement tomorrow so that he can be questioned about what he wants to tell us?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it is up to the Government to decide whether they wish to make a statement.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, we are now proceeding to the Adjournment debate.

Mr. Forth: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have indicated already that I will take no further points of order on this matter.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I beg to move, That the House sit in private.

Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 163 (Motion to sit in private):—

Question accordingly negatived.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In view of the fact that the Home Secretary advertised to the press today that he was to make a statement on Third Reading, and in view of the fact that he could have made a statement at 7 o'clock, which is the point of interruption, have you had any notification that he intends to make a statement tomorrow about the very serious issues on the review of the sentencing for murder?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have not been advised that the Home Secretary wishes to make a statement, but no doubt he will have heard the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Forth: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you help the House and even the Government by ruling that on a future similar unfortunate occasion, should it ever occur, and I hope that the Chair will do everything to ensure that it does not, it will be in order for the Home Secretary to request to make a statement at the conclusion of business at 7 o'clock? His synthetic anger simply belies the fact that he either does not understand how the House works or he did not want to make the statement in first place.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have ruled on that by saying that I have had no request from the Home Secretary to make a statement, but I repeat that he will have heard what the right hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Wilshire: It is a separate point of order about the business of the House.

Can you confirm, Madam Deputy Speaker, that notwithstanding all the changes to truncate debate, it is still possible, if the Government wish, for business to run beyond 7 o'clock, so it was possible for the debate to continue longer if the Home Secretary was determined to say something?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The debate's timing was decided by the House.

Dementia Services (Norfolk)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

7.24 pm

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk):—rose

Mr. Chope: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. This raises an issue of command and sanction. Mr. Speaker has repeatedly commanded that the Government should comply with his rulings. He now has the opportunity of exercising a sanction by requiring that the Home Secretary comes to the Dispatch Box tomorrow.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said earlier. Both the Home Secretary and the Speaker will have heard what has been said. The hon. Gentleman is now taking time out of the debate for a Back Bencher.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk): I am grateful for the opportunity provided by this debate to raise the concerns of friends and relatives of patients at Rebecca house, a specialist unit for people with dementia that was built just 10 years ago in North Walsham in my constituency. The unit faces closure as part of a review of older people's mental health services by Norfolk Mental Health Care NHS trust. The introduction of a report prepared by the trust stated:

> "Older People's mental health services will change. Services, resources and staff will join existing localities to provide an age-integrated service within Primary Care Trust boundaries."

It also said:

> "Supported by national policies, the local Social Services strategy and carers and users workshops, mental health services for Older People will be updated to provide more community focused person centred care."

If hon. Members can interpret the jargon, that might sound like a good thing, but there is a casualty, as we will lose specialist residential units, including Rebecca house and a unit in the constituency of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon).

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Have the economics been satisfactorily analysed; and, if so, do they point to closure? It would help to know, because many other services in Norfolk and other parts of the country are in the same situation.

Norman Lamb: This is all about finding the resources to improve care for people with dementia in the community, but we must consider what is lost in the process.

Rebecca house was built just 10 years ago as a specialist unit for people with dementia, but now it may be closed. It is highly regarded, and the common consensus is that it would be tragic if it were lost. The backdrop to the review is the Government's direction to strategic health authorities on the criteria for free NHS continuing care. At present, 101 beds for the elderly mentally ill are provided by the mental health trust, which has concluded that only a minority of the patients in Rebecca house and similar units qualify for continuing NHS care. Its assessment is that the whole county needs only 28 beds for acute cases meeting the eligibility criteria. The plan is to build a new specialist intensive care unit for those patients in Norwich.

The Minister will be well aware of the report by the health service ombudsman last February about cases in which the NHS had been too restrictive in the eligibility criteria that it applied to the receipt of continuing care. As a result, strategic health authorities were asked to review their criteria, but since then there has been a great deal of criticism about their lack of progress. I should be grateful if the Minister could provide an update and explain how long it will take to complete those reviews.

Wherever the line is drawn between individuals who qualify and those who do not—many people believe that the criteria are too restrictive, and exclude too many patients from free personal care—it is inevitably arbitrary. Many people find it hard to understand why someone who needs intensive 24-hour care but does not meet the extremely restrictive criteria for NHS continuing care should be subject to means-testing, which, the Minister will know, sometimes leads to people having to sell their home to pay for personal care. People who have budgeted carefully throughout their working life are penalised for behaving responsibly.

As the Minister knows, Liberal Democrats on the Scottish Executive insisted on the introduction of free personal and nursing care as a condition of their continuing support. Does the hon. Gentleman plan to review the unfair penalty that applies in England and Wales, which is imposed on families already under enormous pressure as a result of the tragic illness affecting a loved one? What is his reaction to the fact that because of the way in which the criteria are being interpreted, patients who have qualified for NHS continuing care might subsequently be disqualified because they have become frailer and more sedate? There has been no improvement in their health, their condition has continued to decline, yet they are excluded from free personal care. Surely that must be wrong. I know that the Alzheimer's Society shares that view.

I return to the situation that we face in Norfolk. As I said, in presenting proposals the trust is essentially following Government policy. It was clear from a meeting that I attended at Rebecca house that staff have to care for a wide range of patients with very different needs, some of whom, because of their dementia, display fairly challenging behaviour, whereas others are more frail and sedate. That clearly presents difficulties, so I can see the case for a specialist intensive care unit. However, that raises the question of what happens to those who do not qualify for that unit, but whose care needs are such that they cannot easily be looked after at home. In all this we must remember the interests of those who are frequently required to care for a loved one at home. Often those people themselves are elderly and frail and find it difficult to cope on their own.

Of most immediate concern are all the existing patients of Rebecca house and the other units who do not qualify for continuing NHS care. Where will they go? If Rebecca house closes, they face the prospect of a move to a residential care home or nursing home in the private sector. Given the quality of care that they have received at Rebecca house, we can assume that there is a considerable risk that they will end up in less appropriate surroundings, and in addition it must be borne in mind that the Alzheimer's Society says that it is best to avoid moving people with dementia. In the society's words, that should be "avoided at all cost". A move can disorient the patient and accelerate the decline in their condition.

The trust has made it clear that those who were admitted to the service before 31 March last year will continue to have their care funded by the NHS, irrespective of whether they meet the criteria for NHS continuing care, but it is also the quality of the care that concerns loved ones, not just the cost. For those admitted after 31 March last year there is no commitment to continue to cover the cost. There is also concern about the capacity of the private sector to provide the extra specialist beds that would be needed. There is already a national shortage, according to the Alzheimer's Society. At a meeting for carers held at Rebecca house, one lady described how each week it was necessary to search a local website availability list to find the odd bed that might become available that week.

It also remains unclear what will happen to those who have used Rebecca house for respite care. Four beds are set aside for that purpose. Will the respite care of those people be paid for the rest of their lives? That is incredibly important to those affected. Privately funded respite care is very expensive. When I raised the point with trust representatives, they said that no decision had been reached.

Everyone recognises how important respite care is. If more people are to be cared for at home, resources must be committed to provide an effective support infrastructure. In a rural area such as North Norfolk, people can be isolated in small village communities without public transport. If the carer has inadequate support, they can rapidly sink. The nature of dementia is such that the demands on the carer are intense and constant. Carers need a break. My fear is that the closure of the units will result in less respite care, not more. Does the Minister share my view about the importance of improving access to respite care for those cared for at home?

Rebecca house provides what is described by the trust as informal day care. The loss of that facility will hit many more people. Again, the facility is part of the infrastructure of support for people caring for loved ones at home. We have a situation in which there is a strong case for not moving existing patients, based on their needs; a lack of capacity in the private residential nursing care sector; the imperative of increasing the availability of respite care and not reducing it; and existing day care facilities that are under threat.

For me, that all points to a very strong case for trying to keep Rebecca house open. How that can be achieved given the rather unfortunate and clumsy demarcation between the mental health trust, the primary care trust and the county council social services department, I am not sure, but every effort needs to be made collectively to secure the future of this much-loved and much-valued unit.

I have an open mind about who could run Rebecca house in future, but in an area that has an ageing population and already has one of the highest age profiles in the country, it is foolhardy and reckless to contemplate the closure of Rebecca house. The same goes for other units around the county. I note the commitment of the trust to use the resources freed up by the closure of these units—I understand that the amount will be about £1.5 million—for the improvement of mental health services in central Norfolk, but at the moment there are genuine and continuing concerns about the overall package of proposals.

My plea to the Minister is to ask him to do whatever he can, working with the local trusts, to help Rebecca house and those other units, to help ensure not only that today's patients who are in the home and need it for the rest of their lives are protected, but that there are high-quality facilities for the future.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing this debate, and I pass on to him the thanks of Mr. Iain Dale for having done so; I know that Mr. Dale secured a meeting at Rebecca house on a cross-party basis to express the widespread concerns of residents and relatives about the position being taken by the trust.

I want to highlight for the Minister a fact to which the hon. Gentleman alluded—this is not an isolated case, and the same situation is widespread across Norfolk. Indeed, there are five such units, including Cygnet house in Long Stratton in my constituency, which I understand the Minister visited today. I also understand that some friendly local fox hunters were present to greet him, although I had nothing to do with that. I hope that he found the visit congenial, notwithstanding some of the people by whom he was greeted.

Cygnet house is one of the five units for the elderly across Norfolk. It has units catering for long-term residential care for the elderly mentally ill, and it also offers respite care. The number of units can vary from day to day. On 25 October, it had 11 residents, compared with 14 in Rebecca house. Adding Ellacombe, Yew Tree and Laburnam, which are located in Norwich, produces a total of 49 places on that date—a number that will fall to some 28, as the hon. Gentleman said, under the proposals.

That raises a number of concerns. First, some facilities, especially at Cygnet house, are very local to people in South Norfolk, for whom it is not always easy to get into Norwich, especially when they are elderly people. The Minister will have seen today how large my constituency is; it covers some 350 sq miles. At the moment, Cygnet house provides easy access for relatives, and there is no doubt that Norwich is more difficult to visit.

In addition to the question of access, there is the quality of care that is provided. The father of a councillor in my constituency, Councillor Martin Wilby, has been at Cygnet house for two and a half years, and has received excellent care, both physically and mentally. Mr. Wilby senior has been in homes of various kinds for some 10 years, but his time at Cygnet house has been the best, according to Councillor Wilby. Mr. Wilby senior spent some time at Hellesdon hospital in Norwich, but there was a high staff turnover and the care could be patchy. Cygnet house, which has a low staff turnover and a higher and more consistent quality of care, is in my view and that of many local people better for residents.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk also alluded to cost, which is the other issue that I want to raise. I have a copy of the report to the board of the Norfolk and Waveney Mental Health Partnership NHS trust, which refers to potential options for Cygnet house, including the refurbishment of the facility and its use as a care unit for the whole of central Norfolk. However, the report states that if that option were pursued, clinical and out-of-hours cover, as well as the high revenue costs, would raise concerns. On the face of it, it seems that the change is a cost-cutting exercise, with not enough thought being given to the needs of elderly people with mental health problems who need specialist care, and it does not seem right to make relatives pick up the tab, again.

I strongly endorse the point made by the hon. Member for North Norfolk that Norfolk's demographic profile is old and that in many cases it is getting older—people move to many parts of my constituency in order to retire—so dementia services will grow, not decline, in importance. There are serious concerns about whether the trust's proposal is the right way forward. I have asked Pat Holman, the chief executive of the partnership, to reconsider the closure of Cygnet house, and I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I appreciate the interest that the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) takes in his local health service and congratulate him on securing the debate. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) for their interest.

I also thank the hon. Member for South Norfolk for his concern for my welfare. The fox hunters in his constituency were friendly and took their democratic opportunity to express their views in a reasonable manner.

Dr. Gibson: They are wrong.

Dr. Ladyman: As my hon. Friend says, they are simply wrong, but we will leave that matter to another day.

I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all the staff in the local health economy, who are committed to the improvement of local services and who are doing a fine job. I agree that older people with dementia deserve better services, which is why the Government have set in place a number of initiatives to try to ensure that that happens. More money than ever before is being invested in older people's services, and if I have one message for hon. Members on both sides of the House tonight it is that if we want better services for older people, and especially older people with dementia, we must modernise those services and be prepared to engage constructively and with open minds.

As part of the ongoing process of "Shifting the Balance of Power" to a local level, it is for local NHS organisations to assess the needs of the local population and meet them from general allocation funds. They are in the best position to do that because of their specialist knowledge of their local communities. By devolving funding to the front line, we have given the NHS in every local area the freedom and the resources to develop a strategy for the future that will deliver financial balance and sustainable services.

The latest round of allocations has been made for three years. That certainty of funding will enable health communities to plan their finances and will provide a surer foundation for PCTs to commission services in a way that will deliver improvements in performance. Older people will benefit from those record allocations to primary care trusts, as a considerable portion of those allocations will go to services for older people, including the care and treatment of those with dementia.

That brings me to a point raised by the hon. Member for North Norfolk and challenged by the hon. Member for South Norfolk: if the reconfiguration frees up any resources, the intention is to reinvest those resources in further and better support for older people—the reconfiguration is in no way a cost-cutting exercise. The hon. Member for South Norfolk may be interested to learn that North Norfolk PCT has been allocated £97.6 million for 2004–05, which is an increase in cash terms of about 9.5 per cent.

Just because we have given power and resources to the front line, it does not mean that the front line can duck difficult decisions. All hon. Members have a duty to help their local NHS face those challenges, which is what I ask the hon. Members for North Norfolk and for South Norfolk to be prepared to do.

Before I deal with local issues, the hon. Member for North Norfolk raised some national issues about progress with continuing care. I have made two written statements that detail progress on that. The last one reported on progress up to the end of July. I have no plans to make a further statement on that, but when I have sufficient data I shall do so.

The hon. Gentleman referred to criteria. The legal judgment to which he referred did not suggest that the criteria were too strict. It stated that there is an upper limit beyond which it is ultra vires for councils to provide support. It did not distinguish between social care and health care. The ombudsman, when investigating cases, subsequently said that errors were being made and that there was too much variation in the criteria. Consequently, we asked all strategic health authorities to produce new criteria based on central guidance and to ensure that they were legally compliant. They have all done that. The review is retrospective and covers people who may have been unfairly treated in the past. In addition, we are introducing new procedures to ensure that people are properly assessed in future. I believe that the new procedures are working well.

Reassessment is necessary because people's conditions change from time to time. When their condition changes, the care package that they need changes. We must reassess to ensure that people are getting the care that they need.

Norman Lamb: I fully appreciate that care package needs will change, but does the Under-Secretary concede that that results in a change in the financial package? It means that people move from free NHS care to means-tested care.

Dr. Ladyman: That is possible. National health service continuing care applies not only to people with dementia, but to people with all conditions. Some conditions are curable and it is therefore necessary to remove the continuing care package when someone is cured. That is not the case for people with dementia. However, their care package will need to be changed and, in the very unlikely event that they are cured, it is theoretically possible that they would revert to means-tested support. That would happen only if their predominant needs were no longer health needs and they no longer fulfilled the eligibility criteria. The primary reason for reassessment is to ensure that the care package always matches people's needs.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned personal care and the fact that it is not free in England. I do not know who controls the social services of his local council, but it is entirely in their power to make home care free if they wish to do that because the matter is devolved to local councils. Not one Liberal Democrat council in the country has chosen to do that and I doubt whether any councils will do it because it is not financially viable. It would cost £1.5 billion a year, not the £1 billion that Liberal Democrat Front-Bench Members claim. The Rowntree Foundation has suggested that the cost will increase to approximately £10 billion by 2050. That would be entirely unaffordable.

I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's comments. The changes that he discussed locally in Norfolk, and especially in Rebecca house, are part of a set of proposals that Norfolk and Waveney mental health partnership trust developed in partnership with the PCT, social services and other stakeholders in a wider programme of service improvement and modernisation. There has been a robust and inclusive local process to develop the proposals, including a full needs assessment and options appraisal.

Those proposals are a work in progress and it is for all hon. Members to engage in it and try to influence it. I can assure hon. Members that no final decisions have been made by the local NHS and its partners pending a formal public consultation process, which will commence later this year.

The hon. Gentleman is a member of a party that says that it believes in power to the people, local decision making and devolution. Yet one could interpret his comments this evening as following none of those principles. He seems to have made up his mind before he has listened to the consultation and the views of his constituents—[Interruption.] Well, the formal consultation has not yet begun, and he did not sound to me as though he was keeping an open mind. He sounded as though he had made up his mind. If the services in his constituency are not properly modernised, he will be doing his constituents no favours because they will not be getting the level of service that they deserve.

The hon. Gentleman has talked about local services. There are several thousand older people with dementia in central Norfolk at any one time. Thankfully, only a few require specialist mental health in-patient treatment, yet there are five separate units providing elderly mentally illness—EMI—in-patient continuing care services in central Norfolk. These are Laburnum, Yew Tree, Ellacombe, Rebecca house and Cygnet house. They provide a total of 101 beds. However, only 65 of the 101 beds are occupied, and only 22 of those 65 patients meet the criteria for NHS-funded and provided continuing care and, more importantly, require a specialist mental health in-patient service. The total cost of the services that I have just described is £3.8 million per year. That is an awful lot of money to be spending on empty beds and services that do not best suit some of the people in those places.

Clearly, the demand for these services has changed since they were established. New therapies are now available, and there is a greater recognition that it is important to identify and intervene in the onset of dementia early. That is why the proposal to reshape the services currently provided from these units is being put forward. It will ensure that the resources available to mental health services meet the needs of more people with dementia and their carers, and better fit the needs of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. If we close our eyes to the need to reshape these services, we are ducking our responsibilities. If the hon. Gentleman's first instinct is to say that there should be no change, or even—heaven forefend—to climb on the bandwagon of sentiment that is often associated with establishments, rather than with the people in them, he will not be doing his constituents any favours.

Norman Lamb: I am certainly not suggesting that there should be no change. Indeed, I acknowledged in my speech that there is clearly a case for the proposed specialist intensive care unit. I took on board the views of staff who said that it was very difficult to care for people with all these different types of needs in the same unit. I accept that, but this debate is about engaging in the process that the Minister wants us to engage in.

Dr. Ladyman: I am glad to hear that, but I would be even more glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say that he still had an open mind about the outcome and that he was prepared to accept that it might be in the best interests of his constituents if Rebecca house did not continue to offer the services that it offers at the moment. He will also have to consider the idea that, if there are to be fewer of these units, the 28-bed unit to which he referred will almost certainly have to be very close to acute services, because of the intense health care that many of the people in these facilities require. The primary consideration in determining the location of that unit will have to be the safety and the health care of those patients, and it might not be appropriate for that type of unit to be in his constituency. It might be much better for his constituents—although it would no doubt be more inconvenient for carers—for it to be in Norwich. That is one of the issues that the local population will have to grapple with and talk about in the consultation. The hon. Gentleman will clearly have views about whether the right decision has been made, but we all need to keep an open mind about this.

The national guidance to improve services to which the hon. Gentleman referred includes the national service framework for older people and the national service framework for mental health services. That is the national guidance that his local primary care trust is trying to deliver—

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPARTMENT FOR EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Educational Standards

1. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): What progress has been made in raising educational standards at each key stage; and if he will make a statement. [194091]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): Since 1997, we have seen significant improvements at each key stage. Over this period, the percentage of pupils reaching the expected level for their age in mathematics, for example, has increased by 6 percentage points at key stage 1, 12 percentage points at key stage 2 and 13 percentage points at key stage 3. The percentage of 15-year-olds getting five or more GCSEs or equivalent at grades A* to C has increased by 8.3 percentage points, with some of the biggest improvements in the most deprived areas.

Mr. Challen: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his answer. In anticipation of that answer, I did a little homework on cause and effect. I discovered that, in the Leeds education authority area, funding per pupil has increased by 37 per cent. since 1997 and that there are 913 more teaching assistants and 1,356 more support staff than there were seven years ago. It does not take a great—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman send these discoveries in writing to the Minister?

Mr. Clarke: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the outstandingly high quality of his homework, which sums up why there has been such great improvement and investment, and such substantial reform, which mean better education for the people of this country.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): A vital stage in raising standards at key stage 4 will be the recommendations of the Tomlinson report. In a letter to the Financial Times on 20 October, the Secretary of State said:

> "The status quo is not an option ... we should have a constructive debate about the way forward, not dismiss a substantive set of reforms out of hand."

Yet on 19 October, the Prime Minister seems to have done just that in a speech to the CBI, when he insisted that

> "GCSEs and A-levels will stay".

Which position are the Government now taking on the Tomlinson report—that of the Secretary of State or that of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Clarke: With respect, the hon. Gentleman simply has not been up with the debate. My remarks about the status quo not being an option were made in this House in a statement, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) responded. Both what we say—that Tomlinson is the right way forward—and the fact that any diploma structure would include proper recognition for A-levels and GCSEs are right. That is the core issue that we debated at length when I made the statement. Where the hon. Gentleman is right is that Tomlinson will enable standards to be driven up and take the situation forward in a very positive way. I am delighted that we will publish a White Paper early in the new year to set out exactly how we intend to implement it.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree with Professor Adrian Smith that multiplication tables should be taught in our primary schools? If he does, what is his estimate of the proportion of primary schools that teach multiplication tables in a way that ensures that our children learn them by heart?

Mr. Clarke: First, as the hon. Gentleman knows, I have accepted the reports and proposals of Professor Adrian Smith. Indeed, I appointed him to his role precisely because of the quality of his advice. Secondly, I believe that multiplication tables are very widely taught in primary schools. I do not have a figure to hand, but I can say that in the primary school that I most recently visited, in Yorkshire, multiplication tables for children were on a whiteboard that morning—and that was a random case. I simply do not accept the hypothesis behind the question that there is some lack of attention given to basic arithmetical methods in schools. In fact, I think that the very reverse is the case.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is most important to reassure parents, teachers and students that standards are rising? Will he flag up the information that the Education and Skills Committee received from the permanent secretary of Norway's education department when it visited Norway 10 days ago? The permanent secretary said, "We would like to learn how the UK is succeeding in raising standards so dramatically. We spend much more per head on our children without such good results."

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct, and I am glad to say that such examples are not confined to Scandinavia. Last week, a delegation from the Education Minister to the German Länder asked the same question; Germany had a great national debate, almost a crisis, after its relatively poor performance in PISA—the programme for international student assessment—a couple of years ago. Yesterday, I received an invitation from the new Spanish Education Minister for my Department and me to attend a seminar in Madrid to discuss raising education standards in Spain. We are doing well by any international comparison.

Schools (Colchester)

2. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): If he will visit Colchester to meet the heads of schools with a high proportion of children from military families. [194093]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State listened carefully to the views expressed by schools when he visited Colchester last year. The Department will work closely with the National Association of State Schools for Service Children, and we are currently looking at ways in which we can help to encourage the sharing of experience and good practice to support schools with service children.

Bob Russell: That answer will not do, because 16 months ago the Secretary of State, in a high-profile visit to Colchester, met head teachers and governors of the six schools that attract a large proportion of children from military families and led them to believe, in the words of the headline in the Colchester Evening Gazette, "You will get more money". The Secretary of State should make a return visit to explain what has happened over the past 16 months and why the promises that he gave on what was a Labour party stump visit have not been delivered.

Mr. Lewis: May I first say to the hon. Gentleman that every visit that my right hon. Friend makes is high profile? The issue is important and it should not be used for petty political point scoring. We should be concerned about three elements: first, that children of service families have access to high-quality education; secondly, that their parents can be guaranteed that that will be the case; and thirdly, that schools that deal with a disproportionately high number of children from service families should receive the support that they need to cope with the inevitable turbulence. Consequently, we will work with the newly reformed National Association of State Schools for Service Children and examine tangible and practical measures to support schools and families in those circumstances. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make a constructive contribution to that process.

Healthy Eating

4. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What plans his Department has to promote healthy eating in schools; and if he will make a statement. [194095]

5. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): What progress has been made on improving healthy eating in schools. [194096]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): In September this year, we published the "Healthy Living Blueprint", which includes important measures to promote healthy eating in schools.

Mr. Amess: Although I am delighted that the Health Committee report on obesity has triggered a national and international debate on the subject, action is now needed. Does the Minister agree that the amount of fat and sugar in what we eat and drink is a critical factor in obesity? If so, will he take action on the important issue of vending machines in our schools and address what is sold from those machines and when such snacks are available to our children?

Mr. Twigg: I agree that we must reduce fat, sugar and salt consumption. We are re-examining the standards for secondary schools and primary schools with respect to both vending machines, which is the point that he has raised, and school meals served at lunchtime.

Tom Brake: On vending machines, the Minister will be aware that Mars and Coca-Cola cannot be advertised in vending machines in Scotland. Does the Minister plan to introduce a similar ban here?

Mr. Twigg: I understand that those companies volunteered to make that arrangement, and that they will do the same here. We want to ensure that healthy options are available through vending machines. Excellent examples exist of schools providing fruit juices, cereal bars and other such options in their vending machines, and some evidence suggests that children prefer to take those options, where they are affordable.

Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): I know that my hon. Friend is aware of the campaign by Ilford Jewish primary school to extend the free fruit initiative to key stage 2—a petition has been sent to Downing street and the school has started its own orchard. Is he considering extending the scheme to key stage 2, which is the object of the campaign run by children and staff?

Mr. Twigg: I am aware of that campaign by Ilford Jewish primary school and of my hon. Friend's strong and consistent support for it. The Department of Health has been promoting the fresh fruit scheme, which has made a real difference at key stage 1. We would encourage schools to consider using their resources further to extend the fresh fruit scheme as part of their own healthy eating schemes. We do not have any national plans to fund the fresh fruit scheme beyond key stage 1.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): I invite my hon. Friend to visit Four Dwellings school to watch primary school children eating carrots and tomatoes at break and thus see genuine progress. As he makes further progress, will he please not ignore the relationship between healthy eating and physical exercise? Not only calorific intake but how children use up the calories is important. We therefore need a combination of healthy eating and exercise.

Mr. Twigg: Nothing would give me more pleasure than joining my hon. Friend in her constituency to watch children eating their carrots. Indeed, we have redefined carrot as a fruit under the fresh fruit scheme. She is right that healthy eating is only one component of healthy schools. Clearly, the massive investment in improvements to physical education and sport is vital, too.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): Government procurement rules mean that schools often have to award food contracts that are based on price. What steps could be introduced to make it easier for schools and local authorities to source more food from local and organic producers? [Interruption.]

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friends are making puns on the hon. Gentleman's surname. I do not take part in that. We are considering procurement through the healthy living blueprint. It is striking that some schools are managing even with limited budgets to source organic produce locally. We want to ensure that that best practice is shared as widely as possible.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend explain why the Government are not considering extending the successful free fruit scheme? Will he also consider the possibility of free milk in schools for younger children?

Mr. Twigg: I agree that the scheme is successful. Of course, it has only just gone nationwide and we want to monitor its impact. To be frank, the scheme carries a cost. The Department of Health has come up with the money and we are grateful for that, but we must consider our spending priorities for schools. The focus is on ensuring that as much money as possible goes into school budgets so that it can be spent effectively. The same thinking applies to school milk. Many schools provide it, and although we welcome that we do not want to impose it as a requirement on every school when there are other pressures on school budgets.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): Has the Minister read the evidence that when healthy, good-quality food is provided in school, more students opt for school meals? Has he seen the evidence of the link between good healthy food and good behaviour? Does he understand why secondary school students feel that they are being treated as second-class citizens when twice as much money is spent on food for prisoners as on food for students? Does he understand the Soil Association's criticism of the Department yesterday that rightly highlighted the shocking loss of mineral content in school meals? Students get only 80 per cent. of their iron intake and 68 per cent. of their zinc intake from them. That could lead to long-term problems. The Department talks of an evaluation exercise, setting up an expert steering group and more monitoring. Does the Minister understand that less talk and more action is needed?

Mr. Twigg: Action is precisely what we are taking. We introduced basic nutritional standards, which did not exist before 1997. Some of the examples that the Soil Association gave yesterday do not fulfil our current standards, which we are now revising. We have got the experts in to examine the matter and we shall have new standards for secondary schools from next year. We accept that standards are not as high as they should be in many secondary schools. We will work with the Soil Association and others to ensure that we have the best standards in every school.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Although there are many excellent school catering staff, does my hon. Friend agree that many staff were deskilled when nutritional standards for school meals were abolished? What are his plans for improving the training of school meals staff? Evidence in my constituency shows that having good, well-trained cooks who are prepared to cook from scratch radically improves the quality of school meals.

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend is right. I pay tribute to her for her excellent work in raising the matter in the House and beyond. One of our commitments in the blueprint is to improve the training for catering staff in schools so that we can attain the enhanced quality for which she rightly asks.

Grammar Schools

6. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): How many pupils were being educated in grammar schools in England (a) on the latest date for which figures are available and (b) five years ago. [194097]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): In January 2004, there were 152,610 pupils in grammar schools in England—4.6 per cent. of all secondary pupils. In 1999, the figure was 140,880—4.5 per cent. of secondary pupils then.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the few pleasant surprises provided by the Government is the positive attitude that they have taken to the survival and development of grammar schools? Can he give us an assurance that that policy will continue?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's surprise is inaccurate, in that that is not exactly the course of action that we have been following; I am sorry to disappoint him. The Select Committee on Education and Skills produced a carefully considered report on this matter, which was published a couple of months ago, and we will provide a detailed response to its proposals in the next week or so. The hon. Gentleman will have to wait until then to see precisely how we deal with those proposals.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Secretary of State agree with the 1997 quote from a Labour colleague of ours? He said that the grammar school system

> "was a response to the needs of a vanished society which required a small educated class and a large number of manual workers. It is no longer the appropriate model for a world where most jobs require educated men and women."

Given that the Member in question was my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), when is the Secretary of State going to do something about this dodo in the educational aviary?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend will be shocked to hear that I agreed then with every word of that speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield and I agree with it now, which is why our recent policy proposals—the five-year plan—focused directly on the needs of every child, using the slogan "every child matters". Society has changed in precisely the way set out by my right hon. Friend, and our education system has to meet the needs of every single person. That is now the test for every school, institution and the Government in this process.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): The Secretary of State will doubtless be aware that the grammar schools in my constituency do an excellent job not just for their own pupils and the wider community, but in working very well with all other schools in the area. Will he confirm that the Government have no intention of lowering the percentage needed in a parental ballot to abolish grammar schools, so that I, in turn, can assure all those members of the Labour party in Kent who are trying to destroy Kent's grammar schools that they are wasting their time?

Mr. Clarke: I must refer the hon. Gentleman to the response that we will give to the Select Committee in couple of weeks' time, which will address precisely that point. However, it is worth examining in some detail, and in precisely the way that I have identified, Ofsted's report on education in Kent and the selective system's impact on every child in that county. I know that he will want to be sure that every child in his constituency is getting the support that they need to achieve in every respect, and I commend the Ofsted inspector's report on that matter to him.

Children's Centres

7. Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the provision of children's centres. [194098]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): We have already announced 71 children's centres and we will shortly be announcing more. We are committed to providing 2,500 such centres by March 2008, which will include one for each of the 20 per cent. most disadvantaged areas. We are working up plans to provide a children's centre in every community.

Mrs. Humble: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Is she aware of the great benefit that children's centres have already brought to Blackpool, of the enthusiasm with which parents and professionals have greeted them, and of the welcome for the £1.6 million for the second phase of such centres? However, is she also aware that in order to continue delivering the quality service of the first phase, she might need to consider yet further additional resources?

Margaret Hodge: I am pleased that my hon. Friend is getting such a positive response to children's centres in her community. We are certainly gathering huge amounts of evidence about the impact of Sure Start children's centres on outcomes for children—from the relationship with the mother in the early days, to a child's readiness for school as they move through those early stages. We intend to pursue this programme, and by 2008 we will be spending some £4.4 billion—just from the Department for Education and Skills budget—on early years and Sure Start. I do wonder what would happen to that extremely successful programme, were the Conservative party ever to get back into government.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Children's centres are a good idea; perhaps in her next answer the Minister might refer to fathers, which she did not do a moment ago. She will also want to ensure that state-provided children's centres do not crowd out private and voluntary sector providers. For example, providers currently have to face some 28 separate funding streams and application processes. Is it not time to amalgamate some of these funding streams and tear down the artificial barriers to child care supply?

Margaret Hodge: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman thinks that children's centres are a good idea, and I look forward to his party committing itself to continuing the expansion of children's centres in the way that we have. I agree that the role of fathers in children's centres is important, and some of our best Sure Start programmes are working hard to engage fathers as well as mothers in their child's early development. I also agree that we have too many funding streams, both for the private and voluntary sector and the statutory sector, to enable local communities to develop children's centres that make sense. That is being examined as we speak, and I hope to have some good news for him on that in the not-too-distant future.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): An application for a children's centre is being made from a vibrant, multicultural, multilingual area of my community. Does the Minister have any advice for those making the application in terms of refinement of the criteria?

Margaret Hodge: It sounds as though there may be some problem in relation to the application to which my hon. Friend refers. I am happy to talk to her if she wants to write to me about it. In terms of criteria, we are looking for children's centres to provide services around the needs of the child and their family, bringing together early years education and child care, community health services, from health visitors and midwives through to speech and language therapy, and support for families, whether parenting support for mothers and fathers or support to enable parents to move from education and training into work. We are looking for that coherent set of services, around the needs of the child, in children's centre plans.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): By the time that children enter formal education they need to be self-confident, well-adjusted and ready to learn. Does the Minister agree that child care settings should be used to ensure that children gain the personal and social skills that they need to succeed at school, and that high-quality early years provision could in due course help to reduce antisocial behaviour in teenagers? Does the Minister agree that the quality of child care is even more important than supply, eligibility and cost, on which the debate usually focuses?

Margaret Hodge: There is huge consensus across the Chamber today, but I am waiting for the Opposition to tell us whether they would match their intent with resources. Of course I agree with the hon. Lady that readiness for school is not just about the cognitive skills that we want children to develop but their social skills, emotional well-being and physical well-being. The joy of this Labour Government initiative to provide those services around the needs of the child is that we are beginning to see evidence from all those indicators that children are better prepared for school. I concur completely with her that if we develop all those facilities, children are far less likely to display antisocial behaviour later in life.

The hon. Lady talks about the quality of child care, which is very important, but we must bear in mind quality, supply and affordability. There is huge demand out there from many parents for high-quality, affordable child care and we must build that infrastructure as quickly as we can. High-quality child care is what makes all the difference to the child, and that is foremost in our minds.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Regrettably, in Scarborough and Whitby, the consensus that we have heard in the Chamber is not mirrored in the behaviour of the Conservative borough council—not a local education authority—which is in the process of withdrawing the current children's centre provision. Can the Minister give some priority to examining the problems that will face my constituents in the deprived areas in which she and the Government want to invest, so that we can make good the massive mistake that the Conservative council in Scarborough is about to make?

Margaret Hodge: I am sorry to hear what my hon. Friend says about his local authority.

If we are to deliver a really effective early years and child care infrastructure, we must deliver it through local authorities. Our whole agenda represents a huge vote of confidence in local government, but we depend on our local authority partners to deliver. We can provide the resources and support, but they must deliver.

This is a popular policy, as is clear from what has been said here today. I think my hon. Friend's district council would be extremely unpopular if it did not provide these services: it would be letting children down, and not giving them a good enough future. We will highlight the authorities that do good work, as well as those that fail to deliver for children and families in their communities.

School Admissions

8. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): How many parents did not secure their first choice of school in the last year for which figures are available. [194099]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): The House will be pleased to know that research into secondary school admissions by Sheffield Hallam university and the Office for National Statistics shows that 96 per cent. of parents were offered places at schools for which they had expressed a preference, and 92 per cent. were offered places at schools that the admissions authority thought was their first preference.

Andrew Selous: As the Minister will know, the number of appeals by parents who have not been given places at the school of their choice has increased by 50 per cent. under this Labour Government, and a recent survey showed that some 70,000 parents moved house between April and September last year in an attempt to get their children into their chosen school. Why will the Minister not abolish the surplus places rule, and also ensure that schools have more freedom to take more children if they choose?

Mr. Miliband: It is a fine day when the Opposition's central policy is to abolish a rule that does not exist. There is no surplus places rule. Opposition Front Benchers' idea that they will make their way into government by abolishing something that was actually abolished by this Government's predecessor really does beggar belief.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): Does the Minister agree with the Select Committee on Education and Skills that the Government's rhetoric on school choice is entirely incompatible with the withdrawal of free school transport proposed in the School Transport Bill, which will be debated later today? Does he accept that, in response to a parliamentary question about what the Government had done for school choice, a Minister revealed that they had funded the expansion of only four popular schools? Would it not be better for the Government to adopt the Conservative policy, scrap the School Transport Bill and introduce a right to choose, so that 100,000 extra parents could be given places at their first choice of school?

Mr. Miliband: We will be discussing the Bill later, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman what does not increase choice. It does not increase choice to take £1 billion and put it in the private sector for an assisted places scheme. It does not increase choice to allow primary as well as secondary schools to choose their pupils. And it certainly does not increase choice to stop schools using distance as a criterion for entry. What sort of madness is that?

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Does the Minister not recognise the considerable sense of injustice felt by parents whose children are denied admission to local community schools as their first choice because of outer-borough pupils coming in under the Greenwich judgment? Following the failure of the Camden compromise proposals in the High Court, will his Department take responsibility for coming up with alternative proposals?

Mr. Miliband: Of course I sympathise with any parent whose child is not given a place at the school of his or her choice, but I am sure the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that—especially in London, which has 32 boroughs—there will be a series of cross-borough movements by pupils whose nearest schools are across a boundary. I am not sure that his simplistic solution would work.

School Closures

9. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): How many secondary school closures there have been in Essex in the last five years. [194100]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I understand that in the last five years Essex county council has closed one secondary school, but that it was immediately replaced by a new voluntary-aided Church of England school on the same site.

Bob Spink: Does the Minister accept that Canvey Island children—excellent children, generally—need more facilities, and a greater focus on education? Does he agree with me, and with the excellent county councillor, Ray Howard, that there should be no proposal from Essex county council that would threaten one of our three excellent secondary schools on Canvey Island—not least because of the increased pupil numbers that would result from the 4,000 extra houses that the Government are forcing on it? [Interruption.]

Mr. Twigg: I am being heckled by my hon. Friends behind me and by the Liberal Democrats to remind the House that the council in question is a Conservative council, but I was not going to make a party political point in response to the hon. Gentleman's perfectly legitimate constituency matter. I am aware that the authority is in the middle of consultation, and we have received his representations, and representations from at least one parent in his constituency, on this matter. He will understand that I cannot comment beyond that, because this matter has to be decided at local level.

A-levels

10. Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon) (Lab): If he will make a statement on grading of advanced level examinations. [194101]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): The Government play no role in the grading of external examinations. That is the responsibility of the regulatory authorities and the awarding bodies. The final report of the working group on 14-to-19 reform makes a number of recommendations regarding the future grading and reporting of achievement at advanced level. We will address these proposals in detail in the form of a White Paper early in the new year.

Mr. McWilliam: Will my hon. Friend assure me and the House that he will in no circumstances reintroduce the unfair and disgraceful quota pass system?

Dr. Howells: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. I find it hard to believe that anyone would want to go back to a system of setting quotas for those who can gain A-levels. We are interested in quality, not quotas. Surely, in a modern democracy, the basis for any public examination is that if someone meets the agreed standard, they pass. That is why the quota system was abolished by one of the intellectual architects of what used to pass for modern conservatism, the then Secretary of State for Education, Sir Keith Joseph.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I know that my hon. Friend has a constituency similar to mine, in which levels of educational attainment at A-level and other levels are very low. In South Kirby, on my patch, 49 per cent. of the people have no qualifications at all, either at A-level or any other. In Featherstone, the figure is 47 per cent. These figures are obviously very poor. Does the Minister agree that we should be enhancing education provision in such constituencies? In that context, will he look carefully at the actions of the university of Leeds, which is now actively withdrawing facilities in the city of Wakefield, thereby depriving my constituents and others of educational opportunities?

Dr. Howells: I will certainly look into the activities of Leeds university on the Wakefield campus, and I hope that my hon. Friend will allow me to come back to him on that matter.

School Admissions

11. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What assessment he has made of the likely impact of changes to the school admissions system made by local education authorities. [194102]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): The introduction of co-ordinated admission arrangements will make the admissions process smoother and easier for parents, who will be able to express all their school preferences on a single application form. It will put a stop to the current situation, in which some parents hold offers from two or more schools while others have none. It will instead ensure that all parents receive a single offer of a school place on the same date.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Minister for that reply. Given his earlier reply to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), I know that he will be well aware that the surplus places rule still operates in practice, not least in the form of the guidance that the Government issue to local education authorities. As all four of the secondary schools in my constituency are now effectively full, will the Government rescind the surplus places rule to allow good schools to expand? That is exactly what parents want.

Mr. Miliband: As the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), said earlier, five of the first 11 questions today have been from hon. Members representing Essex. The Essex men have been busy, and I congratulate them. There are 600,000 spare places in the education system around the country, and it is precisely to take account of the situation in places such as Essex that we have made it much easier for successful and popular schools to expand, supported by a dedicated pot of capital expenditure. As the applications come in, they will be treated very sympathetically, precisely to allow that to happen. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman, however, that some schools do not want to expand, because they think they are the right size already.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Minister says that the new arrangements will make the process smoother and easier for parents, but does he know how stressful it is for parents and children? In the Ribble valley, parents have to put down all four of their choices, including the grammar school, as No. 1. If their youngsters fail to get through the examination process, not only do they not get their second, third or fourth choice but they are offered a place in a school many miles away in another borough. That is completely wrong. Would it not be far better to allow the youngsters to try the exams first and, if they failed, to offer them a place at another excellent local comprehensive school, rather than carting them off to a school many miles outside the area?

Mr. Miliband: What the hon. Gentleman is proposing is that some children from some families should have two choices, or two bites of the cherry, while other children should only get one. The new system, which has been carefully tested in a range of authorities, has led to less stress, not more. There is a single form on which applications are made and a single date on which all parents get the results. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but if he writes to me with any details, we will look into them carefully. This is the first year of the new system rolling out nation wide. We are happy to assess how the system works in practice, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the reports that we are receiving suggest that the system is now much smoother, not more difficult.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): Has the Minister followed the coverage of the case of a single mother in Labour-controlled Reading who feels that her son's chance of a good education has been compromised by the introduction of a ranked preference scheme? Why did the Secretary of State allow that option to be made available to local education authorities, when his own code says that that variant

> "may therefore lead to less parental satisfaction overall, where there is significant variability in schools' popularity and/or quality"?

Does it not demonstrate yet again that, when it comes to school choice, the Government are all talk and no action?

Mr. Miliband: The Government's record suggests the opposite. We have moved from a position in which 450 schools were getting fewer than 25 per cent. of young people up to five A to C grades at GCSE to one in which about 60 per cent. are gaining those grades. Any talk from the Conservatives about how choice has been reduced is a load of nonsense. I have not seen the "Reading Advertiser" from which the hon. Gentleman got this particular story, but I am happy to talk to my good and hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), to find out more about the details.

Spending (Secondary Pupils)

12. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): What the average standard spending assessment per secondary pupil is for (a) England and (b) Cornwall; and what the equivalent figures were in 1996–97. [194103]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): In 2004–05 the average formula spending share for secondary pupils in England is £3,106 per pupil. In Cornwall, it is £2,935 per pupil. Because of changes to the funding system, I cannot provide the equivalent figures for 1996–97, but the total recurrent funding for pupils aged 3 to 19 has increased in Cornwall in real terms by £830 per pupil since 1997–98, compared with £940 per pupil nationally.

Matthew Taylor: The Minister will be aware that part of the reason why the spend per pupil is so much lower in Cornwall than the national average is the area cost adjustment, which gives more money to what are regarded as higher income areas in London and the surrounding area. Would he rule out taking that even further and basing the system on a direct relationship to local wages, which would leave Cornwall, which has the lowest wages in the country, with the lowest funding in the country? That is precisely the system that his colleagues in the Department of Health are bringing in for hospital funding.

Mr. Twigg: I am not aware of any suggestion to move to such a system for the funding of local education authorities. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right about the ACA. He will be aware that the existence of a threshold is a provision that actually benefits Cornwall. Without that threshold, the position would be worse than the one that he described. The ACA is updated each year to reflect some of the changes that are taking place in local labour market patterns and we have undertaken, as part of our five-year strategy, to look again at the funding formula, and consultation on it will begin early next year.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): Any analysis of standard spending assessments on secondary school pupils would show that my area of Barnsley is consistently below the national average. That discrepancy is hampering the efforts that we making in Barnsley to improve standards and results. I ask the Minister to look yet again into spending on Barnsley to establish whether we could be brought up at least to somewhere around the national average.

Mr. Twigg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. What we are seeking to do through the national formula is to have a system under which a pupil receives the identical level of funding wherever he or she goes to school. That has brought about significant improvement in the system, but clearly there is always room for discussion about whether we are getting it quite right. That is why, as I said in my previous answer, consultation will start in early spring 2005 on how the formula should work in the medium and longer term.

Student Grants

14. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What problems have been reported to his Department concerning the new software available to local education authorities for the administration of student grants. [194105]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): I am informed that, following early teething problems, the new Protocol system for administering student support has now stabilised and is doing the job as intended, processing and paying out funds to higher education students from England and Wales. Most LEAs are now processing applications within the standard six weeks. We have also invoked contingency action to release interim payments to existing students who applied by the deadline but whose assessment could not be completed by the start of term.

Dr. Pugh: I appreciate that acknowledgement of relative failure, but does the Minister agree with officers in my authority who say that the main problem relates to the need to interact with a centralised system by telephone lines across the country more or less simultaneously everywhere, causing the system to be slow, to go offline and to leave valuable staff twiddling their thumbs? Does he recognise the problem, and has he consulted my authority on how to rectify it?

Dr. Howells: There were problems, but they have now been largely ironed out. The root of the trouble has often been LEA systems not being correctly configured to accommodate Protocol. Having spent many happy hours back in the early 1990s on the Public Accounts Committee, looking at how lots of agencies and Government bodies did not quite get their computer systems right, I am very much aware that they are very delicate beings and we are often over-ambitious in the way in which we use them. I have been assured, however, that this is up and running and working relatively well.

Adult Residential Colleges

15. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the contribution made by adult residential colleges to lifelong learning. [194106]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): These colleges provide valuable opportunities for those who get pleasure and personal fulfilment from learning, particularly older people. The publicly funded provision of individual Adult Residential Colleges Association colleges has to be planned and agreed between the college and the local learning and skills councils. At a national level, discussions are taking place between ARCA and the Learning and Skills Council on the future position of the colleges.

Mr. Kidney: I share my hon. Friend's high regard for the colleges. Members of the Adult Residential Colleges Association tell me that they are very keen to contribute to the Government's agenda on lifelong learning. Commendably, they are concerned about their fees structure excluding some people who would wish to take part. Is he willing to meet members of ARCA to discuss a national strategic approach to creating social inclusion in the work that they do?

Mr. Lewis: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's effective advocacy on behalf of the colleges. I agree absolutely that there is a case for looking at them in a national context to recognise the contribution that they make to the lifelong learning agenda. I will be absolutely delighted to meet him and members of the association in the very near future.

Student Loans

17. Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): How many higher education students are waiting to receive their student loans for the current academic year. [194108]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): Of the 807,000 applications received so far, only 73,000 are still being processed, all of which were received after the published deadlines. Local authorities and the Student Loans Company have never been able to guarantee payment at the start of term to late applicants. Where necessary, we have invoked contingency action to release interim payments to existing students who applied by the deadline but whose assessment could not be completed by the start of term. As in previous years, the Department has written to higher education institutions asking them to be supportive of students who do not have loans in place at the start of term.

Norman Lamb: The Minister says that students who applied on time will have got their money, and indeed the latest news on the Department's website, dated 8 September, still says that those who applied on time should get their money by the start of term; yet my constituent, Jackie Benny, has written to me to say that her daughter is still waiting—although she has at last received the interim payment of £1,000 this week—does not know how much she will get overall, and is being pressured by the college to make the payments. Will he increase pressure on colleges to ensure that they treat students sympathetically, and will he also do more work with the LEAs that are having problems—there are lots in Norfolk—in getting the applications processed on time?

Dr. Howells: As I understand it, Norfolk county council is one of the LEAs that has been experiencing particular difficulties with processing. Interim payments have been made—I am glad that the hon. Gentleman's constituent's daughter has received hers—but I undertake to find out precisely where the difficulty has arisen.

Small Schools

18. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What his policy is on the funding of small schools on more than one site. [194109]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): The funding of split-site schools is a matter for the local education authority to determine. Authorities have considerable freedom to decide on the detail of their school funding formulae and they are able to include factors that provide additional funding for small schools, including those that operate on split sites.

Mr. Heath: There are undoubtedly difficulties with federated small schools with single management but two completely separate sites, although that is often the right answer for very small village schools. One of the problems is the funds that are now supplied directly from Whitehall to schools, because they do not take into account the higher running costs and higher capital costs for schools that operate on two separate sites. Will the Minister look at the situation again? I accept the fact that some responsibility lies with the LEA: I can take that up with Somerset LEA, but I ask him to take the issue up with his officials.

Mr. Miliband: Our responsibility is to ensure that the funding system provides sufficient flexibility and funding to all local authorities to take account of the particular needs in their area. Our intelligence was that the hon. Gentleman intended to raise a particular issue in his question. I thought that he was going to congratulate the Government on the help that they have given to Somerset county council in respect of St. Mary and St. Peter's first school. Since he has not, I am very happy to do so. I am sure that the House will be pleased to hear about the split-site allowance of £11,180, and the curriculum protection for a school with sites in two villages of £44,081 that have been allocated to the school. Those figures suggest to me that the system is working, at least in some respect.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Witness Intimidation

20. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What plans the Crown Prosecution Service has to assist in tackling the intimidation and harassment of witnesses. [194083]

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): The "no witness, no justice" programme will enable the Crown Prosecution Service to give greater support to victims and witnesses who are at risk of intimidation or harassment. In order to protect witnesses, those responsible for intimidation or harassment can be prosecuted. Prosecutors can apply for defendants to be remanded in custody or be subject to bail conditions, and the courts can order that they sit in private if that is necessary to enable witnesses to give their best evidence.

Chris Bryant: My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that in many close-knit communities, such as former mining communities like the Rhondda, issues of harassment and intimidation of witnesses can come very high on the list of miseries created in the criminal justice system for many ordinary, decent families. Can the CPS get involved with the police—and the local authority, in the case of antisocial behaviour orders—from the beginning of the process to ensure that witnesses and victims stand a real chance of seeing it reach a just conclusion?

The Solicitor-General: In respect of antisocial behaviour action, the prosecutors form part of the team and will work with the police and the local authority, and with Victim Support. We also have to be sure that as well as providing the right level of support for victims and witnesses, we allow defendants the opportunity to put their case and defend themselves.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): The principle that justice should be done in public and fully reported occasionally has to be tempered by the need to protect victims and witnesses. That is so not only in criminal cases, but in family law proceedings, especially those involving children. What guidelines have been given to the CPS in relation to victim or witness anonymity and curtailing of reporting rights, and are any further guidelines proposed?

The Solicitor-General: In relation to the criminal courts, the principle is that the courts should be as open as possible. Justice should not only be done, but be seen to be done. Issues should be tried in public. If it is necessary to place restrictions on that general principle to enable witnesses to give their best evidence, prosecutors can apply for several special measures. The hon. Gentleman mentioned other jurisdictions, and indeed I recently issued a written statement about an amendment to the Children Bill. In the family courts, the general rule is that they sit in private—the opposite of the criminal courts—unless it is ordered that a hearing should be open. We needed to amend that to bring increased openness and accountability so as to build public confidence in family proceedings.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that dealing with witness intimidation will be essential to the success of the new north Liverpool community justice centre? What plans does she have to deal with that important issue?

The Solicitor-General: We all think that the Liverpool community justice centre is a really important step forward, and I take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend, her parliamentary colleagues and all those who have worked to get the centre up and running. We hope it will be very successful. The key is to ensure that problems are identified early on, the concerns of victims and witnesses are understood and appropriate action is taken.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): In the context of encouraging witnesses to come forward and participate in the court process, I am sure that the Solicitor-General will agree that one of the key elements is reassurance that the Crown Prosecution Service will take them and their cases seriously, and that much good can be done if the CPS is seen as a fearless champion of the public interest in prosecuting offenders. In that context, what sort of message is sent out when a 63-year-old farmer in Norfolk, Mr. David Key, arrests two individuals in his farmyard in the act of siphoning off petrol, one of them allegedly admits his participation in the offence, yet a CPS spokesman says that it will not proceed on the basis that > "The property involved was not of great value. A decision has to be made if it was worth while to bring a prosecution bearing in mind the chances of getting a conviction"?

Will the Solicitor-General see that the matter is looked into urgently? What sort of message does it send out to witnesses and those who fear intimidation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That supplementary is far too wide of the original question.

Government Legal Panels

21. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): How many names of counsel are on the panels maintained for Government legal work; and how other counsel may have their name added to those panels. [194084]

The Solicitor-General: The Attorney-General maintains panels of counsel to undertake civil and criminal work for all Departments. There are 307 counsel on the civil panels and 578 on the criminal panels.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. I do not suggest that the Government are unduly litigious, but they spend substantial amounts of public, taxpayers' money on legal services, so does she accept that there is an obligation to ensure that there is fair access for those who have the talents and qualities to undertake such work, including newly qualified barristers and—dare I say it—solicitor advocates?

The Solicitor-General: My hon. Friend is right. We need to get two things right: to ensure that the Government have the best legal advice and advocacy when they are involved in legal proceedings; and that access to the interesting and important work of representing the Government in court and giving them legal advice is fair and open. As he says, that work is well paid. It also provides opportunities for those doing it to go into the judiciary. Perhaps I can take this opportunity to pay tribute to my predecessor, Lord Falconer, who took the process from being a bit of an old boys' network and made sure that it was fair and open.

Antisocial Behaviour Orders

22. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): Whether the Crown Prosecution Service has a role in the antisocial behaviour order procedure. [194085]

23. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): What advice she has given to the Crown Prosecution Service about the prosecution of people who breach antisocial behaviour orders. [194086]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service considers whether an antisocial behaviour order application is appropriate following a relevant conviction and, if so, makes a request to the court. The CPS is also responsible for prosecuting breaches of antisocial behaviour orders. Full guidance on the law and practice regarding those orders, including the prosecution of breaches, was issued by the Director of Public Prosecutions to all Crown prosecutors and caseworkers in April 2004.

Mr. Chapman: I very much welcome the role of the CPS in that regard, and the appointment of a dedicated prosecutor for Merseyside. I invite my right hon. and learned Friend to welcome both the recently announced witness protection measures for those reporting incidents of antisocial behaviour and the announcement today that Wirral is to have more power given to its elbow to tackle that scourge of my constituents by being appointed as an ASB action area.

The Solicitor-General: I thank my hon. Friend for those points. As he said, a specialist prosecutor is covering his area—Iain Criddle, who has been described in local newspapers as the antisocial behaviour tsar. I am not sure that I would go as far as that, but he is working for the CPS with a team of people to deal with the problems that my hon. Friend raised.

Bob Spink: To some extent, ASBOs, curfews and dispersal orders work very well, and Essex police used them to great effect on Canvey Island this year. However, does the right hon. and learned Lady accept that the CPS and the courts should use the toughest possible action to deal with breaches of ASBOs, and that generally they should send offenders to prison? In that way, they would send out the right message and make sure that ASBOs' effectiveness continues to improve.

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point when he says that it is important that breaches of orders on antisocial behaviour made by the court should be dealt with effectively, so that confidence that the orders mean what they say can be sustained. Sentencing is a matter for the courts.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): My right hon. and learned Friend will agree that ASBOs have played an important part in curtailing trouble in areas, but does she not agree that the press has a right to print the names of people for whom application for such an order has been successful? Does not the press also have the right to ensure that people are aware when an ASBO has been breached?

The Solicitor-General: The press has a right to report anything that the law does not expressly prohibit.

Service Personnel

24. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What supervisory responsibilities the Attorney-General has for the law as it relates to service personnel. [194087]

The Solicitor-General: The service prosecuting authorities are subject to the general superintendence of the Attorney-General. Regular meetings are held with the service prosecuting authorities, especially the Army prosecuting authority. I refer the House to the statement that I made on 15 June, in which I set out the Law Officers' responsibilities for prosecutions of people subject to military law.

Mr. Prentice: What is the mechanism for calling in a case for trial in the civilian courts? Is the commanding officer obliged to follow the advice of the Army prosecuting authority? If he does not follow that advice, is the case automatically referred to the Attorney-General?

The Solicitor-General: The vast majority of offences committed by Army personnel are dealt with by courts martial, following investigation by the military police. In some cases, notably serious ones, there is concurrent jurisdiction. That means that a matter could be tried either in a court martial or in a Crown court. Normally, the most appropriate jurisdiction is agreed between the CPS and the Army prosecution authority. If there is no such agreement, it is for the Attorney-General to decide in which jurisdiction the matter should be tried.

Reform of Laws on Murder

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con)(Urgent Question): May I ask the Home Secretary to make a statement on his proposals for the review of the law of murder?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reiterate to you and to the House the apology that I issued last night for the way in which this matter has been handled. It had been my intention to address the issue of the review on homicide during Third Reading of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill—a debate that did not take place. The press release issued by my Department was premature, and steps have been taken to prevent anything similar from happening in the future.

There has been a long-standing debate over many years about the need to review the laws on homicide. The Law Commission has produced a report on partial defences to murder. In the Standing Committee considering the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill, amendments were tabled and there was substantial debate. An amendment was tabled yesterday for the Bill's Report stage, but it was not selected for debate.

Many people, including a wide range of those in the judiciary, have called for clarification of the issues involved, which include provocation, partial defences and the interface between murder and manslaughter. I therefore propose to establish a review, the terms of reference for which I shall lay before the House shortly.

I want to make it clear that the starting points for murder, agreed by Parliament and set out in the Criminal Justice Act 2003, will remain. It is our intention that the review should take no more than 18 months and I will, of course, lay its findings before the House when it is complete.

Mr. Hogg: It would be ungracious of me not to welcome the Home Secretary's apology, but does he accept that what he did was an abuse of the House? First, Third Reading debates are limited to the Bill's content. Surely he knows that. Secondly, important statements on policy should be made in circumstances when he can be questioned, not in a tightly timetabled speech when he can refuse interventions. In any event, to release a press statement before making a statement to the House was contrary to Mr. Speaker's repeated instructions to Ministers.

Turning to the review, does the Home Secretary accept that it is to be welcomed? Will he accept that there is a considerable case for a single offence of homicide? Will he accept that the offence of murder comprises within it offences of varying degrees of gravity, at the lower end of which they merge on manslaughter? Given that a mandatory sentence of life is inappropriate and that a trial judge should have the right to impose sentences varying from whole life through determinant sentences to non-custodial sentences in certain circumstances, a discount should be available for a timely plea of guilty and, at the expiration of the determinant sentence, there should be a judicially driven process for either restricting a person from release if that person is a threat or even recalling them in such circumstances.

Mr. Blunkett: On procedure and the House, provocation and partial defence, which are central to the review, were part of the debate on the Bill and were raised on the back of the Law Commission report. In fact, amendments sought to draw down on that report. Therefore it was apposite for the Third Reading debate to reflect the debate in Standing Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Opposition Members shout "No", but there has been a tradition in the House for Third Reading debates to reflect on the debates in Committee and on Report, pulling together the various aspects of the Bill. In the 17 years that I have been in the House that has been a pattern for both the Opposition and ourselves. Secretaries of State have responded to the amendments that were moved, the debate that took place and the concerns that were raised, especially if it was not possible to respond to the concerns raised in Committee.

If a member of the Standing Committee thinks that that is inappropriate, I would be happy to take an intervention, but those who were not on the Standing Committee and who did not participate in the debate should reflect on the fact that if the issues of provocation and partial defence have been raised, and the Law Commission review has been drawn on for debate, it would be totally wrong for the Home Secretary not to reflect on that, had the Home Secretary had the opportunity to do so had there been a Third Reading debate.

On the substantive issues raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, it is precisely in order to address those complex issues, including those that relate to diminished responsibility, to some of the issues raised by the Law Commission about the fear of violence, to the interface between manslaughter and murder—to which he rightly referred, as I did in my response to the urgent question—and to the long-standing wish of the judiciary to have total freedom, that we established the review. I take this opportunity to ask right hon. and hon. Members to submit their comments on that and tell us what they would like included in the review. It was because we wanted to allow people to contribute to the terms of reference that we put the statement out yesterday.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): On behalf of a constituent whose twin sister, Madeleine Humes, was brutally stabbed to death by her husband, may I ask my right hon. Friend to try to ensure that as a result of the review killers will no longer use provocation or other technical defences to get away with grossly inadequate prison sentences, and that in future anger and jealousy at the breakdown of a relationship will never be accepted as an excuse for killing one's partner?

Mr. Blunkett: I accept the latter point unequivocally. It is because of the complications in trying to do the right thing, and finding that other aspects of the behaviour and the relationship with the law would be detrimentally affected, that we want a review rather than simply a response to what was described as the patch on the system that the Law Commission recommended. We have decided that a review is necessary so as to avoid a partial solution, which might lead to other complications.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I agree with the Home Secretary: this matter was raised in Committee, not least by me. I am grateful for his statement today. My only comment on yesterday's events is that his press release should have said, "Check against delivery," in case the delivery never happened.

Murder is a uniquely abhorrent crime and must be treated with the utmost seriousness. The Law Commission review of partial defence suggested further work in four different areas: the definition of the offence; whether it should be categorised on grounds of aggravation and/or mitigation; in light of the above, consideration of the application of a mandatory life sentence; and cases in which the offender is a child. Is the Home Secretary ruling out the work that the Law Commission wants to do on the third category, the mandatory life sentence, taking into account the fact that it may preclude proper prosecution or conviction in the case of some murders involving a high level of mitigation?

On provocation, does the Home Secretary agree that the present law is deeply unsatisfactory in two ways? As the Law Commission says:

> "It is morally offensive to regard as 'provocation' conduct by a victim which in truth calls for society's protection".

On the other hand, again quoting the Law Commission:

> "It affords . . . no defence to a person in an abusive relationship who acts in genuine fear of serious violence".

Will the review consider self-defence? It is clear from recent cases that there is a lack of clarity as to what is an appropriate level of self-defence.

Finally, press reports suggest that there are concerns in other Departments about the application of the review of murder to matters with which they are concerned. Will the Home Secretary assure the House that there will be no restraint on the review's terms of reference that will prevent it from looking at deaths in, for example, military service or railway accidents?

Mr. Blunkett: I can give an absolute assurance on the latter point about other legislation that may be introduced in the House. The Crown Prosecution Service is looking at self-defence, which is, from time to time, a burning topic in the British media. It is right for the review to address signal issues of that sort.

On mandatory sentences, I am attempting to protect the will of the House as expressed in the Criminal Justice Act 2003, not least when we legislated that life should mean life in the most horrendous and heinous cases. People may have differences on the flexibility of the judiciary as regards the interface between manslaughter and murder, where there are issues of partial defence, but I do not think that there would be major disagreement in the House on the idea that, having established the principle that life means life in horrendous cases, we should hold to it.

I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman that press releases should have the careful wording that he mentioned inscribed on the bottom. None of us knows what is going to happen to us during the course of any 24 hours.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge), I say to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that this matter will be of great interest to people in Scotland. Has he had any discussions with the Scottish Executive about his review, and if not, does he intend to?

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General has had discussions with her opposite number in Scotland, and of course the Justice Minister and I keep closely in touch—we had discussions just three weeks ago. The Scottish legal system being different, Scotland is of course in a different position. It has moved ahead of us or, depending on one's point of view, alongside or behind us on a number of issues relating to murder.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I cannot remember a time when a Minister, let alone a Home Secretary, has been dragged to the House twice in one week to explain himself: first to explain why he surrendered the British veto on asylum and immigration, and now to explain why he tried to slip an announcement of the first review of murder law for 50 years into a brief debate on domestic violence. On both occasions the right hon. Gentleman should have volunteered a formal statement to the House. However, in view of his gracious apology, I will leave all of that to one side.

The importance of the review is not to be underestimated, so perhaps the Home Secretary could answer the following questions about the proposed review. When the Law Commission reported, I think that the right hon. Gentleman himself said that there was no intention of abolishing the mandatory life sentence. That seemed to be repeated yesterday. The Home Office also said that the review would consider all alternatives. Those are mutually exclusive, so which is true? Or is it the case that the review will consider partial defences in a way that may reduce the number of people facing a mandatory life sentence?

On the point of self-defence raised by the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), the Law Commission specifically excluded a partial defence to murder based on the excessive use of force in self-defence. As the Home Secretary said, this has direct relevance to the concerns over legal interpretation of reasonable force when, for example, householders are faced with burglars who threaten them in their own home. It was not clear to me from what the Home Secretary said whether the review of this would be by the Crown Prosecution Service or within the formal review. As the right hon. Gentleman said earlier this week that he was open to suggestions about changes in the law, will he ensure that the formal review includes self-defence in the matters that it covers?

Does the Home Secretary agree with the Solicitor-General, who is sitting next to him, that the partial defence of provocation should be abolished, or does he agree with the Law Commission that it should be retained? Has the review been announced late because of internal Cabinet rows? In particular, is it true that the Deputy Prime Minister instructed the right hon. Gentleman to clear the precise terms of reference with his Cabinet colleagues? Is it true also that those Cabinet colleagues sought to exclude euthanasia, military killings, railway crashes or corporate manslaughter from the review?

There were more than 850 murders last year. Knife killings alone climbed by 35 per cent. to 270. There is serious public disquiet about the leniency of guidelines for murder that are proposed by the Sentencing Guidelines Council.

The review is to be welcomed. I only wish that it had been presented in a more intelligent manner.

Mr. Blunkett: I do not recall a Home Secretary not being able to make a speech on Third Reading of a major Bill, including—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Home Secretary speak.

Mr. Blunkett: I am doing my best, Mr. Speaker, to act intelligently so that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) does not get too aerated.

I do not remember, even on very controversial Bills—I have been no stranger to controversial Bills over the past seven and a half years—not being able to make a speech as a Secretary of State on Third Reading—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have granted this urgent question, and I can stop it at will. If hon. Members shout, that is what I will do, so they have a choice.

Mr. Blunkett: I merely seek to make the point that I was in no way intending to hide the review. In fact, having announced it too early and given it too much time for publicity, the very opposite is true. Therefore, I repeat to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden my offer that the terms of reference can be influenced by Members of all parties. I would be happy if he were to take me up on it.

We are not ruling out the issues around self-defence, which are very important. We legislated on amendments to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 to be able to strengthen the rights of householders in terms of not being sued, and to be able to take action in reasonable circumstances. There is controversy still about how far someone could go in terms of partial defence. Therefore, it is on those issues—this refers, as does provocation, to the issues that the right hon. Gentleman has raised—that consideration should be given to just what the impact would be.

The Crown Prosecution Service is reviewing all homicides over the past three years. We need to take account of the actions that the CPS will want to take, and to feed the evidence into the review. The right hon. Gentleman asked me about the Law Commission and the contradictions. It is precisely because there are contradictions on the issue of provocation and partial defence that we were not prepared to amend the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill. We felt that a patch or temporary solution would not be satisfactory, which is why the review has been brought forward. Above all, we have an intelligent view of the issue, so no decisions have been taken and no avenues have been closed off other than to protect the interests of the House and the decisions that were made on murder last year. Everyone is welcome to help us get this right. If it were not a complex and difficult issue we would have been able to deal with it effectively over the past 50 years, and victims of all sorts are angered that we have not done so.

On the question of whether the review will mean that provocation may result in a lower sentence, it may mean that some people are found guilty of murder who are not at present. Provocation has been abused by perpetrators of crimes who have used it to show partial defence. Because of those complications, an intelligent, thoughtful and slightly calmer approach is necessary, as I would genuinely like the results of the review to last another 50 years. If Opposition parties are prepared to join us in getting it right, everyone in the country will be very grateful.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement, and I welcome the review. I am reassured by what he said about provocation, but does he not agree that the courts are only too ready to accept the defence of provocation and that many men are getting away with murder? Can he assure me that that will be looked at very seriously in the review?

Mr. Blunkett: I can assure my hon. Friend that it will be, and I thank her for her contribution to the debate. I think that we are all horrified when people claim that provocation means the wife or partner deciding to leave the household, or requesting that their partner or husband leave. Provocation cannot be used to justify domestic violence, never mind murder. Too many people are in denial and believe that it was somehow their fault that someone committed violence against them, which is why we have spent months legislating on the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill. I repeat something that I have said on a number of occasions in the House and which I would have said last night—we are grateful to everyone who has contributed to the Bill's passage and to making it work more effectively.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): While I fully agree with the Home Secretary that a life sentence for murder should mean going to prison for life, and while I welcome the review, does he not accept that what occurred yesterday was a result of the unreasonable nature of the programme motion imposed on the House? Can he not persuade the Leader of the House, who has joined him on the Treasury Bench, to look again at the Procedure Committee's reasonable proposals, which the Government did not accept? Limitation of debate on Report and on Third Reading—the only truly democratic stages in a Bill's passage, when everyone can participate—should be ended.

Mr. Blunkett: No, I do not accept that proposition and, of course, it will not be part of the review.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I think that we all agree that it is perfectly possible to have a sensible and rational debate about reform of the law on murder. However, who will chair the review and who will serve on the review committee?

Mr. Blunkett: I have said that I will lay before the House the terms of reference, the procedure and the way in which evidence will be drawn from the Home Office. I promise the hon. and learned Gentleman that I will send him a copy personally.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) is usually a good timekeeper, but he arrived four minutes after the statement started, so I cannot call him. I call the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble).

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I refer the Home Secretary to the answer that he gave his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall), and remind him that the law in Northern Ireland is close in its fundamentals to that of England and Wales on this matter? What contact has he had with the Northern Ireland Office, and what steps will he take to ensure that, while the House is responsible for enacting criminal law with regard to Northern Ireland, major changes will be replicated there as they are made here? How will he tackle the difficulty, which he knows full well, of getting the Northern Ireland Office to keep the criminal law of Northern Ireland in step with the law here?

Mr. Blunkett: I am familiar with the point made by the right hon. Gentleman, which his hon. Friends have made on a number of occasions. I am in very close touch with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, as he would expect, and I would be happy to write to him about the way in which we intend to proceed to ensure that we get this right with regard to the particular position of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Does the Home Secretary accept that by imposing the mandatory sentence of programming on all legislation he is party to the murder of proper parliamentary scrutiny, which is one of our primary responsibilities in the House? In the light of his experience, particularly in the past 24 hours, is there any chance that he will back the case for the defence of Parliament?

Mr. Blunkett: I think that the shadow Home Secretary called for an intelligent debate, and I hope that we will have one.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): There are two issues here—first, the serious need for an intelligent review, as the Home Secretary rightly said, of the question of partial defences for murder, and, secondly, the great concern shared by parliamentarians from all parties about the Government's disgraceful attempt at news management. His admittedly gracious apology would be more convincing if he and Ministers throughout Government were not serial offenders. Parliamentarians from all parties would understand why they repeatedly act in that way if they read the biography of the former MP for Hartlepool, Mr. Mandelson. I bought a remaindered copy for £2.99, and it shows that ever since Labour were in opposition their spokesmen have attempted that kind of news management. If the tactic succeeds they have won, but if it fails, they make hollow apologies.

Mr. Blunkett: I have always believed that Peter Mandelson was good value for money, and the hon. Gentleman has just affirmed that that is the case. If my Department had been intent on news management it would not have issued the press release until the Third Reading debate had begun. Having issued it early, we can hardly be accused of hiding it.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The Home Secretary avoided answering one important question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). Is it not true that he is in serious dispute with the Solicitor-General about whether provocation should constitute a partial defence for murder and that that dispute has now reached such a stage that the Government are seen as indecisive? The review is all about trying to settle the dispute and get the Government out of this mess?

Mr. Blunkett: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has repeated the mistake made by the shadow Home Secretary, and has confused a sensible discussion about whether we should have a patch or a long-term solution to provocation with the issues surrounding corporate manslaughter. The two are related, but will result in entirely different solutions in the legislation that we will publish shortly.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Home Secretary would have found it difficult to make today's statement on Third Reading, because he would only have been able to talk about what is in the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill at the moment. We had a long discussion in Committee about the use of provocation as a partial defence, which the Government refused to accept, although it was highly pertinent to the Bill. Could he tell us in clear terms what is his view of provocation as a partial defence? If he cannot do so today, can he tell us when the review will be completed and he will therefore be able to do so?

Mr. Blunkett: If we had wanted to accept the amendment, we would have done so. I dealt with the matter on Second Reading, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber to hear me do so. It is precisely because there are differing views and because we need to get this right in the long term that we established the review. I am just sorry that the hon. Gentleman is too churlish to say, "What a good idea. Let's try and get this right over the next 18 months and find a lasting solution."

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I do not think that the Home Secretary was here on Tuesday, when the House debated programming. On that day, the Leader of the House attempted to kid us all that there was great consensus about how programming operates in practice. I think that the events of last night show that that whole argument has now gone for a ball of chalk.

I wish to reinforce the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) from the Front Bench. Can the Home Secretary give us an assurance that the review will include in its conclusion a clear definition of what constitutes reasonable force in a defence of family and property? This is clearly a vital area of the law that remains confused, not least as a Home Office spokesman said on being challenged last week that the Home Office does not have a definition of reasonable force. If the Home Secretary's own Department cannot define it, how can he expect anybody out there in the real world to know what it is either? Will he give us a guarantee that the review—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the Home Secretary.

Mr. Blunkett: The judiciary has been defining reasonable force over a long period. In dealing with the use and the fear of violence and the defence of property, it would be sensible to consider the issues where they apply to murder and manslaughter. However, the review is not about a campaign by The Sunday Telegraph; it is about a serious issue of trying to square circles that have remained un-squared for the past 50 years. I sincerely hope that we will be able to get it right and that, when the review is over, we will be able to bring it back to the House of Commons and have exactly the kind of debate that hon. Members have been seeking this afternoon.

Business of the House

1.1 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 1 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Gambling Bill.

TUESDAY 2 NOVEMBER—Remaining stages of the Children Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 3 NOVEMBER—Motions relating to the Senior Salaries Review Body's triennial review of parliamentary pay and allowances, followed by a debate on the Procedure Committee's report on the Sessional Orders and Resolutions.

The relevant motions and explanatory memorandums for the debate will be tabled today and made available on my office website: www.commonsleader.gov.uk.

THURSDAY 4 NOVEMBER—A debate on defence procurement on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 5 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 8 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Housing Bill, followed by consideration of Lords amendments.

TUESDAY 9 NOVEMBER—Remaining stages of the Civil Partnership Bill [Lords], followed by consideration of Lords amendments.

WEDNESDAY 10 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Human Tissue Bill, followed by consideration of Lords amendments.

THURSDAY 11 NOVEMBER—Opposition half-day, un-allotted. There will be a half-day debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced, followed by consideration of Lords amendments.

FRIDAY 12 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business.

At the beginning of this year, while blocking my Bill designed to protect civil servants from political interference, the Government promised to publish their own civil service Bill during this Session. Here we are eight months later; when will it be published? If there is to be pre-legislative scrutiny, can it be done by a Joint Committee?

May we have a debate about parental contact and the family justice system? That would enable us to ensure that the system was fair to fathers and to look at how expert evidence should be dealt with to avoid the tragedy of children being taken from their families unnecessarily.

We have normally had an annual debate about the United Nations in the main Chamber, although I realise that there is a debate today in Westminster Hall. Bearing in mind the reports of widespread corruption in the oil-for-food programme in Iraq, which is said to have netted Saddam Hussein and his friends $10 billion, and the concern that the Secretary of State for Defence expressed in the House that such money was funding the current insurgency, surely we should have the annual debate here in the main Chamber.

May we also hear from the Deputy Prime Minister as to how he is responding to the north-east referendum? With only a week to go, the ballot returns are tiny, and there are reports that 17-year-olds have received ballot packs in Northumberland and that voters in Darlington have reported that their packs contained a charity envelope rather than a voting paper. I know that Ministers are begging people to vote, but is that not a step too far, and may we have an early statement?

Earlier, the House heard the Home Secretary apologising for putting out a press release that said that he had announced the murder review during the debate on the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill when that did not prove possible. Unfortunately, the Leader of the House had allowed so little time for the debate that the Home Secretary was unable to speak. Was that not an example of Ministers shooting themselves in the foot by trying to be too clever, the Home Secretary jumping the gun and the Leader of the House curtailing debate so that hon. Members could go home? The day before, he was extolling the virtue of systematic guillotining of Bills, and he forced through his motions in the teeth of opposition from the official Opposition, the Liberal Democrats and all other parties in the House except the Labour party. What does he say today? Will he put an end to this sort of nonsense?

Finally, a fox managed to walk into Portcullis House yesterday—[Interruption.] Or possibly ran. In any event, does the Leader of the House have any plans for the systematic hunting of foxes in Portcullis House?

Mr. Hain: I am completely foxed by that question. I hope that there will be no hunting in the Palace of Westminster and that Opposition Members who are great huntsmen will not encourage that practice.

I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not have the grace to thank the Government for our great generosity in providing an extra half-day of Opposition time on Thursday 11 November in return for a statement having invaded an Opposition day.

On the draft civil service Bill, a document will be published shortly. There is no intention to put it to a Joint Committee. On parental contact, the Government are just as concerned as the hon. Gentleman to address the issue, although we do not accept the Fathers 4 Justice manifesto in its entirety, as he has perhaps suggested. We are concerned about parental contact and will address the issue in the near future.

On the hon. Gentleman's request for an annual United Nations debate, I shall certainly look into the matter. I note his point about corruption and Saddam Hussein's siphoning off of billions of pounds of United Nations money under the oil-for-food programme. That is one of the many reasons why the situation prior to the invasion was unsustainable. We were seeing widespread corruption and Saddam enriching himself and his elite, while Iraqis continued to be impoverished.

On the Deputy Prime Minister and the north-east referendum, the hon. Gentleman said that there might be tiny returns. I think that he might be surprised. I understand that the returns are now accelerating, and I hope that the people of north-east England will vote yes. They are entitled to their voice for their region, just as Wales is entitled to its voice, and has it, and just as Scotland and Northern Ireland have their own national voices as well. As for the reports of charity notices in ballot packs, I am tempted to say that that is a very charitable gesture by the Government, but I am afraid that I do not know anything about that detail.

It is not acceptable for the hon. Gentleman to use the difficulty yesterday, on which the Home Secretary has reported to the House and apologised, to try to undermine the whole principle of programming. It has nothing to do with that. Indeed, on the contrary, timetabling yesterday and for all Bills has enabled the Opposition to put their case vigorously, and that will continue to be the case.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Among the business just announced is the consideration of Lords amendments. Very extensive Lords amendments seem to be on their way to us, including on the Hunting Bill. Perhaps I can take this opportunity to express sympathy to the Leader of the House for the incident that he faced last night. Frankly, the rational discussion about this issue that I saw reported from the other place is in stark contrast to the irrational thuggery to which he was subjected in Oxford last night. I happen to think that the Bill is misguided, but I hope that hon. Members in all parts of the House will deprecate what happened to him last night.

May I ask the Leader of the House to make a statement about the appropriate way for Ministers to make statements? I wholeheartedly accept the apology that the Home Secretary has made, but surely the business managers should have apologised to him, as they could have protected last night's Third Reading on the Order Paper if they had wished to do so. In any case, the Home Secretary's statement this afternoon in answer to an urgent question demonstrates that we needed a proper statement. The fact that Mr. Speaker enabled such a statement to be made demonstrates that a brief statement on Third Reading would not have been sufficient, because it would not have provided an opportunity for hon. Members on both sides of the House to question the Home Secretary.

The case is not isolated. May I draw the Leader of the House's attention to the written statement made last night by the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs about UK emissions, which is an extremely important issue? It contains the second retreat on that matter this year and should surely have been made in the House to enable all hon. Members to question the Secretary of State. Indeed, I understand that the Secretary of State wanted to make such a statement, but other Ministers—the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—opposed her and the Prime Minister overruled her. Surely that undermines the UK Government's position in relation to both the presidency of the Union and the chairmanship of G8.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

Emissions are a global threat, which some think more important than terrorism. May I draw the Leader of the House's attention to early-day motion 1839 and ask for a proper statement from the Secretary of State in the House?

[That this House condemns the decision of the Government, announced first to journalists and pressure groups and only subsequently to the House, and then in a written rather than oral statement to apply to the European Union to increase by almost three per cent., the UK's permitted carbon emissions under the EU Emissions Trading Scheme; sympathises with the Environment Secretary whose wishes to hold the line were overruled by the Prime Minister; notes that the only interventions by the Prime Minister on environmental matters, notwithstanding the promise held out by his speeches, are when he seeks to weaken environmental protection; and suggests that he will find it difficult to achieve his stated aim of persuading other countries in the EU and G8 to take the fight against climate change seriously if he fails to do so himself.]

Mr. Hain: On that last point, we are strongly committed—indeed, we are one of the leading Governments in the world on these matters—to the Kyoto treaty, solving the problems of climate change and reducing emissions, which is why the Secretary of State made her written statement. However, our approach must be balanced between the competitive needs of our businesses and the need to reduce emissions to meet our obligations and reduce the threat of climate change. I agree that climate change is a menace that faces the planet, and the hon. Gentleman is right to make that point.

I understand that this Government have made as many statements as any previous Government, and the Prime Minister has made more statements over equivalent periods in the House of Commons than either of his two Conservative predecessors. It is simply not the case that we are churlish about making statements. We come to the House whenever we can to make statements, but we must maintain a sense of proportion or we will interrupt the other business of the House.

It is also important for the hon. Gentleman to recognise that we can only protect Third Reading debates if we have programming. We do not want to return to the old days in which proceedings ran on into the night, causing chaos and inconvenience not only to hon. Members, but members of staff in the House. He should keep his comments in proper proportion.

I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the attack on me at Balliol college, Oxford, last night. We must distinguish between the legitimate case that the huntsmen must make, which I respect, and their right to protest against Ministers and Cabinet Ministers, like me, and what he described as "irrational thuggery". Hon. Members and Ministers are vulnerable to violent attack. Had it not been for the presence and diligent intervention of an armed police officer in the room in which I was speaking at Balliol college, I would have been assaulted, so I am grateful to the police for their co-operation.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): Is my right hon. Friend aware that today is the tercentenary of the death of England's greatest ever philosopher, John Locke, who was the author, among other things, of a devastating attack on the idea that the divine should form the foundation of governmental authority? He was the originator of the idea of the separation of powers and his ideas were hugely important to both the French revolution and the American revolution. Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on why almost nobody in this country understands their debt to that great thinker and on how our culture is so ignorant of its roots?

Mr. Hain: I understand my hon. Friend's point. The other day, The Guardian carried an article by its leading journalist and assistant editor, Martin Kettle, who made a similar point. John Locke's contribution as one of the founders of our parliamentary democracy should be better recognised by everybody.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House a less philosophical question? He announced a debate on Wednesday on the Sessional Orders; that is nearly a year after the Procedure Committee produced its report. He may have seen reports that the Home Secretary is already minded to introduce primary legislation to deal with long-term demonstrations in Parliament square. Will he confirm that that is indeed the case?

Mr. Hain: I will give the right hon. Gentleman and the House a fuller explanation next Wednesday—I know that you, too, are concerned about the matter, Mr. Speaker—but the Home Secretary is actively considering legislation. To that extent, I can answer yes to the right hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that I am deeply opposed to the continuing Government policy of allowing parents and other adults to beat children. I am deeply disappointed that the Government are allowing a free vote on Tuesday on the determination of reasonable chastisement, but are insisting that Government policy prevents us from allowing children equal protection to adults when it comes to being beaten. The Government say that the police fear that our courts will be inundated with cases, but I understand that the police are finding it more difficult to implement reasonable chastisement than equal protection. Will my right hon. Friend announce that we will have a free vote on Tuesday on equal protection?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has long taken a close interest in such matters, and we all share his horror at the beating or abuse of children. Indeed, children's legislation is designed to give children extra protection, which I know that he welcomes. We will not offer a free vote on any amendment that aims to ban smacking outright, because that is against Government policy, but, as he says, a free vote will take place on the so-called Lester amendment, if it becomes an option.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Leader of the House knows that I am grateful that the debate on the Procedure Committee's report on Sessional Orders and resolutions will happen next week. May I press him on the matter raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), because it is time further to regulate what happens in Parliament square? The noise nuisance, which would not be permitted anywhere else in the country, has been allowed to continue to the disadvantage not only of members of staff, but of other people who work in close proximity to Parliament square. Will the Leader of the House direct his attention to that issue in his speech next week?

I thank the Leader of the House for indicating that the motions relating to the Senior Salaries Review Body will be tabled today. Are the motions already available, because some of us want to table amendments to them in the interests of work carried out by hon. Members?

Mr. Hain: On the latter point, I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern; indeed, hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned by a number of the SSRB's recommendations. He has made representations to me on at least one of those recommendations and I have engaged in cross-party discussions to try to find a way forward. The motions will enable hon. Members to table amendments, which I will consider carefully.

On the Sessional Orders debates, the hon. Gentleman will be encouraged by what we have to say next Wednesday; along with the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), he has pressed me energetically on that matter. We have not been able to address the issue of Parliament square before; it is a complex matter, given the history, but I agree with him about the noise and general nuisance.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): May I ask my right hon. Friend when a Bill making corporate manslaughter an offence is likely to be introduced in this House?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend will understand that it is not possible for me to anticipate the Queen's Speech. However, I emphasise that the Government are committed to introducing legislation on corporate manslaughter. Despite newspaper reports in the past week or so, the Government's commitment to that principle remains firm and I believe that my hon. Friend will be encouraged about the direction that we intend to take.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The Leader of the House may have had his attention drawn to NIPSA's call for the resignation of the Minister with responsibility for education in Northern Ireland. May we have a statement about what is happening with the education boards' finances? It is alleged that the Belfast education board has overspent by between £4 million and £20 million and that there is therefore no money. May we have a statement on the matter next week?

Mr. Hain: The Minister responsible for education in Northern Ireland will note the hon. Gentleman's point but I want to place on record the fact that the Minister has a good reputation for taking forward education policy in Northern Ireland.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The Leader of the House and other hon. Members will be pleased to hear that the campaign for the long-awaited opening of the rail station in Llanharan in my constituency is about to succeed as the station nears completion, thanks to a Labour Administration. However, as we approach the Queen's Speech, I urge my right hon. Friend to consider the measures that may be necessary to ensure that our devolved Administration in Wales has a greater say in local rail and other transport issues, so that my campaign to bring a station to Llangynwyd in the Llynfi valley will be equally successful.

Mr. Hain: I once spent a happy evening at a bed-and-breakfast in Llangynwyd. There is a nice pub in the village at which I ate and I am therefore sure that Llangynwyd deserves my hon. Friend's attention. He will be encouraged by the introduction of the draft Transport (Wales) Bill, to which the Welsh Affairs Committee has given pre-legislative scrutiny. The Committee's members made many constructive points. I am sure that he will be encouraged by the direction that we intend to follow. We intend to give more powers to the National Assembly for Wales to take forward a properly integrated transport policy—for rail and bus—for the whole of Wales.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Bedfordshire police authority is one of the most efficient authorities in the country. More than 83 per cent. of its spending goes on pay and it has made greater efficiency savings than any other force. Yet next year, its funding shortfall is likely to mean the loss of 75 front-line officers. That is not unique to Bedfordshire; it applies to police authorities throughout the country. May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to early-day motion 1830?

[That this House notes the funding shortfall projected for police authority budgets next year; further notes that Bedfordshire Police Authority will need a funding increase of £2.2 million just to maintain existing services whilst implementing the Government's police reform agenda and meeting the rising costs of police pensions; recognises that Bedfordshire faces particular difficulties as its budget is over 83 per cent, pay related and the authority has achieved the highest level of cashable efficiency savings of any police authority in England and Wales over the last five years with the highest proportion of officers undertaking front line policing duties; calls on the Government to recognise the scale of the potential cuts, which in Bedfordshire alone would remove the equivalent of 75 police officers from front line policing; and urges the Government to make sure that the funding settlement is adequate in 2005–06 and beyond.]

Will the Government provide time for a proper and thoughtful debate on funding police authorities?

Mr. Hain: I know that that is an important issue locally; the hon. Gentleman has made it clear that it is important in his area. However, I am sure that he will not dispute the fact that there has been record investment in and funding for our police throughout the country. There are now 12,500 more police officers since the Labour Government came to power compared with 1,000 fewer police officers under the previous Administration's Home Secretary, the current Leader of the Opposition. The Government cannot be criticised for want of support and funding but we must deal with specific anomalies.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Although I have sympathy with my right hon. Friend for what happened to him, would not it be useful if Ministers made it clear that no amount of intimidation, hooliganism and thuggery will stop the Government upholding the House's decision to bring hunting with dogs to an end? Since time is getting short, when will the Parliament Act be used? When will we demonstrate that we will not allow a veto by the House of Lords, as happened on a previous occasion?

Mr. Hain: I know of my hon. Friend's passionate feelings, which he has regularly raised, about the matter. The Government's position is clear; we await the return of the Bill from the House of Lords so that we can ascertain the form that it takes.

I am grateful for my hon. Friend's sympathy but there is an issue about the security of Members of Parliament in conducting their parliamentary business in their constituencies or through public engagements. It is one thing to put a forceful argument or stage a protest to make one's point—I have done that in the past on apartheid and other issues, and I defend the right of the supporters of hunting to demonstrate—but it is another to engage in violence, thuggery and personal attacks on Members of Parliament, Ministers or otherwise, as happened to me last night. It would be in the interests of the pro-hunt position to stick to the argument, make the case and refrain from violence and thuggery.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): May we have a debate soon on the adequacy of ministerial written answers? On 13 October, I asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who carries out a Labour party function at public expense, to list his official engagements since his appointment to his current Cabinet post. He answered in what Lloyd George described as "the perfect way"; he told the truth without giving any information, replying:

> "I have had a range of official meetings".—[Official Report, 20 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 720W.]

That is all very well, but in 2004, the Government should be a little more candid about what their Cabinet Ministers get up to. The next time the Leader of the House is a beneficiary of one of the "range of meetings" with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, will he encourage him to answer questions candidly and openly?

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy is always candid and open when answering parliamentary questions verbally or in writing. The allegation that he is conducting work on behalf of the Labour party at public expense is nonsense. His appointment is in accordance with the normal rules of appointment for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and he is co-ordinating Government policy.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): The previous question comes a bit rich from the Tory party, which is picking up £4 million of taxpayers' money in Short money and finished fourth in the Hartlepool by-election. It is not money well spent.

May we have a statement about council housing? At the Labour party conference, the idea of the fourth option—namely allowing local authorities to continue to have local council housing—was carried by a massive majority. Will there be a statement on that? I know that the Deputy Prime Minister is busy in the north-east, but when he comes back, there is a big meeting at Congress house tomorrow to follow up the successful resolution. The campaign will carry on and we should have a statement to ensure that the conference decision is inviolable.

Mr. Hain: I understand the force of my hon. Friend's point. The Deputy Prime Minister attended a Cabinet meeting this morning, fresh from the campaign trail. I believe that the campaign will be victorious for my right hon. Friend. He deserves that for all the effort that he has put in. I am sure that he will want to take careful note of my hon. Friend's point.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): There is all sorts of speculation this morning, seemingly to distract attention from the unpopular decision to have the Black Watch in the American sector, that an early decision will be made about the future and fate of the Scottish regiments. Will the Leader of the House assure me that no decision about the regiments' future will taken without fully consulting the House and without a properly debated motion? Does he agree that rushing through the amalgamation as the Black Watch are being deployed would amount to the worst sort of betrayal?

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's viewpoint on the Iraq war. It is different from that of the Government and it is perfectly honourable to hold it. However, to argue that the Black Watch does not play a vital role, even in its redeployment, in protecting other British soldiers, Scots included, in the south and elsewhere in Iraq, is nonsense. The redeployment will ensure that all our forces can be better protected from the terrorist enclaves around Falluja and elsewhere, and that the Iraqi people have the right to vote freely in the elections that are planned for early next year. The Secretary of State for Defence has answered all the points about the future of Scottish regiments consistently.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): Last week, I met management, trade union representatives and workers at Heysham nuclear power station who were concerned about the future of the nuclear industry and their jobs. May we have a debate about our future energy needs and the role that nuclear energy will play in that?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend will have a chance to raise this matter at Department of Trade and Industry questions next week if she catches Mr. Speaker's eye. I understand the importance of those jobs to her constituents, on whose behalf she is rightly very active. As for future energy policy, I am strongly committed to renewable energy. I think that a green future is the future for this country, although nuclear power will obviously continue to play a part in delivering our energy needs for the foreseeable future.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Yesterday, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland reminded the House that it was two years since the Northern Ireland Assembly was suspended and one year since the elections to the Assembly, which has not met. He could have added that it was six weeks since the Leeds castle talks, at which the Government announced that there had been a breakthrough, although nobody has seen any sign of it since then. Might it be appropriate to have a debate on the Floor of the House in Government time to give the Government and the House the chance to explore the serious issues that are arising from the continuing suspension? I was surprised to discover that the last Government debate on the Floor of the House on the general political situation in Northern Ireland took place 10 years ago today. Although this Government are responsible for only seven of those years, is it not time that we had a debate here on the very important issues that are arising because of the collapse of the political system in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. We all acknowledge that he has been a vigorous activist in regard to getting the political process in Northern Ireland back on the road again. As he knows, the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have been engaged for a number of months in detailed discussions about relaunching the whole process. As to whether there is an opportunity for a debate, we shall have to see. Let us make sure that the process is successful; that is the priority.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern about this morning's newspaper reports that, only six months ago, an individual used taxpayers' money to stand successfully for election but has now decided to have a little tantrum and resign his United Kingdom Independence party Whip? Would it be appropriate for us to have a debate about the perils of those individuals who decide to stand for office effectively under false pretences? Should we consider demanding that he pay that taxpayers' money back? If he failed or refused to do so, we should seize his villa in Spain, as it must be surplus to requirements.

Mr. Hain: I must say that I am very attracted by that proposition about Robert Kilroy-Silk. He is obviously too big for UKIP. Perhaps his possible exit from that party will be a source of encouragement to the Conservative party, which is worried stiff about the threat that UKIP poses to Conservative constituencies. As we know, the reason that the Tories have shifted to such an extreme position on the right on Europe is that they are trying to get the UKIP votes back.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): In reply to my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House, who raised the issue of the Government's promise to introduce a draft civil service Bill during this Session of Parliament, I thought I heard the Leader of the House say that a document would be published shortly. Given that the Public Administration Committee published its own draft civil service Bill some months ago, will the right hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance that the published document will at least include a draft civil service Bill, and that when he says "shortly", he means within the remaining three weeks of this Session of Parliament?

Mr. Hain: On the question of the draft Bill, the answer is yes. On the question of timing, the hon. Gentleman will have to wait just a little longer.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): The public service trade union, the Public and Commercial Services Union, is calling a day's strike and a day of action by its members on 5 November in protest against the massive job cuts proposed in the civil service. May we have a debate on this matter, especially as the PCS is supported by claimants' bodies such as the unemployed workers centres, and by a number of Members of the House? Representatives of those bodies have met at least 100 Members of the House this week in order to put their view forward.

Mr. Hain: I have a great deal of respect for the PCS. Indeed, a number of my own officials are members of it—quite rightly so; I am a strong trade unionist myself—and it has a point of view to put forward. In the end, however, we are trying to devolve Government resources and taxpayers' money to front-line services. There will be more jobs involved in that, and more opportunities on top of the 500,000 jobs that have been created in the public sector under this Government. So we are not in the position of previous Governments, both Labour and Conservative, of cutting public sector jobs. We have actually increased them by 500,000, including jobs in the civil service, to tackle such key problems as getting people off benefit and into work, and the problem of illegal asylum seeking.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House a question about one of the unfortunate consequences of today's business? One of the most unreasonable criticisms—although it is a perfectly fair one—that we face is that we are often not in the Chamber. You will understand, Madam Deputy Speaker, that we often have to be in other places carrying out other aspects of parliamentary business. It is particularly regrettable that today, while there is an important cross-cutting question session in Westminster Hall—in which I have been fortunate enough to draw a question—in which Department for Education and Skills Ministers will participate, there will be an important Department for Education and Skills Bill debate, in which I should also have liked to participate, in the main Chamber at the same time. Can we review the practice of having cross-cutting questions at the same time as the main Chamber is sitting?

Mr. Hain: The Modernisation Committee is looking at how the sitting arrangements work, not just in regard to the hours, about which there are strong feelings on both sides, but in regard to how the business of the House interacts with Westminster Hall and with Committee sittings. It is a complicated matter. In a sense, the Government are between a rock and a hard place. We have provided more opportunities for individual Members to raise important issues, through the debates in Westminster Hall, than have ever existed before. I shall certainly look into the hon. Gentleman's point about cross-cutting questions, which provide a special form of opportunity in Westminster Hall, but it is terribly difficult to organise the timetable so that there are no clashes anywhere, given the pressure for more opportunity for debate. However, this Government have provided more such opportunities to Members of the House of Commons than any previous Government.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): May I support the call by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for a free vote next Tuesday during the debate on new clause 12 of the Children Bill, which has been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and which would outlaw the physical punishment of children and give equal protection to children and adults? Is my right hon. Friend aware of the view of the Association of Chief Police Officers, which is that equal protection for children would be the best way forward, and that it would be entirely workable? The association believes that clause 56 of the Bill, which the Government support, is unsafe and unworkable. That is also the view of the Association of Directors of Social Services, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, and the Health Visitors Association. Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge that an enormous amount of evidence is building up to show that clause 56 is not the way forward? Will he, even at this late stage, consider allowing a free vote on the new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield?

Mr. Hain: I am not in a position to add to what I have said to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on this matter, save to acknowledge the championing by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) of children's rights over many years. She will have an opportunity to make her point if she catches the Chair's eye in next week's debate. That would provide a good opportunity for her to put her views on record with greater strength, as she will have more time to do so, and to persuade others of her point of view.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): Over 48 hours last weekend, a rural five-acre field in North Curry, near Taunton, was turned into an illegal Gypsy camp, complete with roads, fences and septic tanks. The right hon. Gentleman will know that returning such sites to their natural state often involves too long a legal process. When will legislation be introduced to speed up the planning enforcement process?

Mr. Hain: The Deputy Prime Minister will obviously pay close attention to the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I know that these problems bedevil constituencies right across the country, and he has made his point very effectively.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Leader of the House will recall that it is a convention, as I understand it, that changes to Standing Orders of the House, or on constitutional matters, should whenever possible be introduced by the Government on the basis of broad consensus with all Opposition parties. It seems that those conventions have been widely flouted in recent years. Can we therefore assume that they do not now apply? If so, surely that is of great detriment to the House.

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point of view, but if he was referring to programming—I am not sure whether he was doing so specifically—the Modernisation Committee took a slightly different position from the Procedure Committee. The Procedure Committee had a powerful case to make, which was argued out vigorously on the Floor of the House, there was a free vote on the matter, and the outcome is there to see.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to a request already made for the early introduction of a Bill to deal with corporate manslaughter? That is a very long-standing commitment from the Government. There has been a long-term campaign by organisations such as the Transport and General Workers Union, of which I am a member, to make sure that corporate organisations and their leading members are properly held to account when disasters occur. Even more importantly, because of such legislation they would take more seriously their responsibility to both the public and employees to stop such disasters happening in the first place.

Mr. Hain: I agree fully with my hon. Friend, and the Government support the position that he has advocated. As a GMB member, not a T and G member, I know the powerful arguments that have been put forward on behalf of that union, the TUC and other unions, for the Government to redress that important injustice and to make progress as we intend to do.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May we have a statement or debate on the funding of secondary education? Such a statement or debate would give me the opportunity to bring before the House the views of a highly respected head teacher, Mr. Robert Underwood, of Hardley school and sixth form college in my constituency, who said in a recent newsletter:

> "A few years ago, under Grant Maintained Status, our school was financially secure . . . In recent years, we have seen those advantages evaporate . . . The extra money which the Government is giving to schools is only given to specialist schools, city schools, failing schools, mismanaged schools or reorganising schools, so we don't get any."

What have the Government to say to those people who carry on doing a good job in mainstream comprehensive schools and find their financial resources squeezed more and more tightly?

Mr. Hain: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is not to vote Conservative. Under this Government, comprehensive schools have had more investment and provision of equipment, such as computer equipment, as any of us who visits their local schools knows. We have seen 28,600 more teachers, more than 105,000 additional school support staff, and average spending per pupil increase by £800 in real terms since Labour came to power, compared with the miserable record of the Conservatives. What are they planning to do when they get back? Their policy is to cut back on public provision and comprehensive school funding, and passport the money out to private education.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): Can I bring to the attention of my right hon. Friend early-day motion 1806, which stands in my name, and which has cross-party support, with the exception of the Scottish National party, whose Members, unfortunately, are again not in the Chamber?

[That this House condemns the offensive language of the Scottish Nationalist Party (SNP) in its reference to the Union Flag as the Butcher's Apron, and believes that these irresponsible comments reflect badly on our armed forces past and present; and therefore calls on the SNP leadership at Westminster to distance itself from these extremist comments.]

The Scottish national party has described the British union flag as the butcher's apron. Given that our armed forces are currently serving under that flag, will my right hon. Friend reassure this House and the armed forces and their families that they are not regarded as butchers? An apology should be forthcoming from the leadership of the Scottish National party for those outrageous statements.

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend. An apology should immediately be made by the Scottish National party and its leader, who sits in this House, for that disgraceful attack on not just our armed forces but the spirit in Scotland, as in Wales, that Scots are proud to be Scots but also proud to be British. The Scottish National party has lost the argument in relation to independence and sawing off Scotland from the rest of the United Kingdom, which is why it is indulging in such petty initiatives.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): I note from a letter from my right hon. Friend that the "Together" campaign on antisocial behaviour is being extended today to include the city of Cardiff. May we have a debate so that we can discuss how to make the campaign work in areas such as Cardiff, where the local authority is dominated by a political party that opposed all those measures in principle?

Mr. Hain: It will be interesting to see whether the Liberal Democrat-controlled Cardiff city council takes seriously its responsibilities to stamp out antisocial behaviour. Liberal Democrats have consistently opposed some of the tough measures that this Government have introduced to stop local communities being subject to the scourge of antisocial behaviour. I hope that the programme being rolled out today in Cardiff, Newport and Swansea will spread right across Wales, because I want more antisocial behaviour orders applied in my constituency of Neath and elsewhere. The law is there—the Government have provided the powers to the police and local authorities, and those powers should be exercised.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend allow time for a debate on the cut-and-sew contract awarded by the Ministry of Defence, which it has transferred to China, which will mean job losses in Lancashire? Under the new Warwick agreement between the Government and trade unions, I thought that that would not happen. Will he allow time to ensure that those jobs are not lost in Lancashire and that China does not produce Army uniforms, especially camouflage?

Mr. Hain: I know that the Secretary of State for Defence is aware of the deep concerns that have been expressed by my hon. Friend previously, as he does properly today, and in north-west England, and he is examining these matters. We have seen record, unparalleled investment in defence under this Government, without comparison under previous Labour or Conservative Governments, and he will know that we have a strong and committed policy in support of manufacturing industry, which will continue.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): Can the House have a debate on the music industry? That would give us an opportunity both to pay tribute to the extraordinary work of John Peel, who sadly died this week, and to discuss how we can use the appropriate implementation of the Licensing Act 2003 to encourage live music in our pubs and clubs.

Mr. Hain: I, like my hon. Friend, am a big supporter of live music in pubs and clubs and of musicians right across the country. Indeed, John Peel was a champion of such musicians, gave many of them the opportunity for a career that they would not otherwise have had, and brought to the forefront of pop interest much previously obscure music, which then became mainstream. We pay tribute to his work and his contribution to all that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): May I echo the sentiments of my hon. Friends the Members for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) and for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) in expressing my belief that if we had a free vote, as we did, on the protection of animals, a fortiori, we ought to have a free vote on the protection of children? The Leader of the House gave the provisional business for the week commencing Monday 8 November. Does he anticipate that the public health White Paper will be published during that period? If that happens then or at a later date, what plans does he have to incorporate in the parliamentary timetable a full debate on public health issues, not just the hour that will follow the statement in the House?

Mr. Hain: Certainly, I will pay careful attention to my hon. Friend's point about public health, but he will be encouraged by the public health White Paper that the Secretary of State intends to publish. It will be path-breaking in terms of taking forward the whole public health agenda. In respect of his concerns, echoing those of other Members, about the Children Bill, smacking and beating and so on, it is important that the argument is put in the context of a Bill that will bring unprecedented new protection rights for children right across the country. It is important that in the specific argument about how that is implemented, we do not lose sight of the fact that it is a fantastic Bill, providing extra new rights, which ought to be acknowledged.

Points of Order

1.49 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. On behalf of my party, may I put on record the fact that we also share the concerns that demonstrations should not be violent, and that I was sorry to hear of the incident involving the Leader of the House?

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have given notice of it both to Mr. Speaker and to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Last week I tabled a question for named-day answer:

> "To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list his public engagements carried out in the week from 18 October."

Although I did not receive the customary personal reply in the post, I see from Hansard that it was answered on Monday as follows:

> "I refer the hon. Member to the answer I provided to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) on 20 October 2004."—[Official Report, 26 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 1053W.]

That answer was raised by my hon. and learned Friend in business questions. He had tabled this question:

> "To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list his official engagements since his appointment to his present Cabinet post."

The reply was:

> "Since my appointment as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster , I have had a range of official meetings including meetings with Cabinet colleagues relating to my cross-Government role in the co-ordination of Government policy, my responsibilities for the work of the Strategy Unit and the Policy Directorate; my Duchy of Lancaster role; and my membership of the Cabinet."—[Official Report, 20 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 720W.]

I know that the Chair does not have responsibility for the inadequacy of the content of answers, but I had asked for an account of public engagements for the week beginning 18 October, and was referred to an answer about official engagements given only two days into that week, on 20 October. Given the view that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—who has so far spent a grand total of four minutes at the Dispatch Box since his appointment—is doing a job which is itself cover for a job running strategy for Labour to win the election, what protection can the Opposition have to hold to account a Minister who does not even give an answer relating to the same period as that specified in the question? We know that this is the sort of treatment that we get from the Prime Minister, but the Chancellor does not have his job yet.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the Chair does not have responsibility for the answers that Ministers give. I suggest that he consult the staff in the Table Office, who may well be able to assist him.

Orders of the Day

School Transport Bill

[Relevant documents: The Third Report from the Education and Skills Committee, Session 2003-04, HC 509-I, the Draft School Transport Bill, and the Government's response thereto, Cm. 6331. The Eighth Report from the Transport Committee, Session 2003–04, School Transport, HC 318, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6254.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has not selected the reasoned amendment on the Order Paper.

1.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I have the honour to present an important and interesting Bill. It is important because it attacks a very significant social and economic problem that needs to be challenged: the school run, with all its negative effects on environment and health, such as congestion in many of our towns and cities. It is important because it gives local authorities freedom to do what they do best—to innovate, and to address and solve problems in their local communities. It is important because it finds ways in which to loosen the legislative straitjacket that has prevented any reforms in this area for many decades. It is interesting because it has the strong support of local government represented by all political parties, who know that the problems in their areas, for which they are responsible, must be solved.

We know that it is for that reason that many local authorities are ready to submit bids to "pilot" their areas, including authorities led by Conservatives and Liberal Democrats. It is interesting, too, because we have the understanding of the churches, for which this has been a difficult question. They have made representations to me since I became Secretary of State, saying that these issues need to be dealt with so that their interests can be protected. We have talked to them at length, and we believe that our proposals do just that.

It is also interesting simply to observe the sheer naked opportunism of Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front Benchers, whose intention is to reap political benefits by sowing misleading and even untrue ideas about the consequences of the Bill.

Let me set out the history. Over a year ago the Government published "Travelling to School: an action plan" setting out a series of measures to encourage more walking, cycling and bus use. At around the same time the Local Government Association published "Children on the Move", which called for greater flexibility and the piloting of new approaches to home-to-school transport. As I said earlier, I am very grateful for the cross-party support from local government.

Since the publication of that document, we have engaged in extensive discussion and consultation on the proposals. They have been the subject of two substantive hearings by Select Committees, the Transport Committee and—with pre-legislative scrutiny—the Education and Skills Committee. Let me express my appreciation to both Committees for the careful attention and consideration that they gave our proposals. They both said that they saw an urgent need for the issues to be addressed, and indeed urged us to take some of our proposals further. I think I can claim that we listened carefully to the Committees, and we have made changes—especially to the prospectus accompanying the Bill—to reflect the different views and concerns expressed by members of the Committees and in the hearings.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): We did urge my right hon. Friend to go further, but we also urged him to go faster. If there is a problem and it will take 10 or 11 years for him to tackle it, that is too slow in our opinion. The environment, global warming and children's health are not things that can be put aside for 10 years.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is quite right, and—if I do not misrepresent them—that was also the view of members of the Transport Committee. That is why, although the arrangements will be entirely voluntary—there will be no statutory requirement on a local authority—it will be possible, if authorities present proposals faster than is allowed for by the Bill, to use secondary legislation to enable us to move more quickly. I can assure my hon. Friend that that deals with his Committee's fear that we may be "frozen" at 20 pilot schemes. What we will not do is establish a statutory scheme that would compel an authority to institute a scheme of this kind. It must be for individual authorities to present their own proposals.

Mr. Sheerman: Is it possible for every authority in England and Wales to produce a proposal so that we can get things moving now?

Mr. Clarke: The suggested 20 pilot schemes are dealt with in secondary legislation. If more than 20 were proposed, it would be open to the Government to provide for us to move faster by means of secondary legislation. What there would not be is a primary legislation gap that would stop things going further. The primary legislation jump that we have not been prepared to make would be the establishment of a statutory scheme requiring my hon. Friend's local education authority, for example, to behave in a certain way. The arrangements are based on voluntarism rather than compulsion.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Can the Secretary of State give any guarantee that rural local authorities in particular will not be put under financial pressure to go ahead following the pilot schemes, particularly if the schemes indicate genuine difficulties for people in rural areas?

Mr. Clarke: I can give that assurance. I shall deal with the money aspect in a moment. The sums spent on school transport by local authorities such as the right hon. Gentleman's are immense. A large part of our plan is to give his local education authority, and other rural authorities such as mine in Norfolk, more flexibility to deal with school transport in a more effective way.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Is the Secretary of State not being rather disingenuous when he says that he will not force local authorities? In fact the Treasury will withdraw the necessary funds, and either parents will have to pay charges amounting to several hundred pounds a year or everyone else will have to pay more council tax.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is completely mistaken. I can assure him that that pressure will not be imposed. That is the sort of scaremongering that I mentioned earlier. There is no possibility of such action. What is a possibility is the provision of better local schemes to provide better services for communities more effectively.

Let me say something about the principles behind the Bill. Increased car use on the school run contributes to congestion and pollution. Encouraging more walking, cycling and use of public transport will bring both environmental benefits and health benefits to pupils, but the key point is that the issues faced vary from area to area: the solutions are different in rural, semi-urban and urban areas, for obvious reasons. So we argue that local education authorities need the flexibility to respond to local need, rather than being tied into a straitjacket that prevents the possibility of their addressing such questions effectively.

We do believe—this view is widely shared—that the current system is inadequate. It serves an average of only 10 per cent. of pupils across the country, but it is also inequitable. As research undertaken by my Department shows, families from lower income groups are more likely to have to pay than those from higher income groups. Again, we argue that LEAs need flexibility in this regard.

So the purpose of the Bill and its content is to enable LEAs to pilot school travel schemes. In the light of some of the remarks made, I emphasise that the Bill will force no local authority to take any action that it does not wish to take. It will be for LEAs to produce their own proposals—they will have to meet certain tests for approval, which I shall set out shortly—to enable them to deal with their own particular circumstances. Initially—this relates to the point touched on by my hon. Friend—the Bill allows a limited number of LEAs in England and Wales to run pilot school travel schemes. The details will be set out in draft regulations, which are available to the House.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman mentioned earlier the position of rural authorities such as his and mine, which spend a very large part of their budgets on school transport. As a result of the Bill, will there be any additional money to provide school transport in our authorities, other than that coming from charges applied to parents and families who currently have free transport?

Mr. Clarke: We have said that we will provide a small amount of pump-priming money to get these schemes off the ground, but I do not pretend that it is an additional significant subsidy for school transport, because it is not.

The figures are immense and it is worth setting them out, so that Members understand the situation. In 2002–03, Somerset—the hon. Gentleman's local education authority—spent just over £7 million a year on school transport. My own authority, Norfolk, spent nearly £17 million, and Cumbria spent nearly £10 million. We believe that there is a real question to be asked as to whether such money is being best spent, and on what is needed, in a given area. We argue that it is reasonable for us to give LEAs such as Somerset—I use that as an example simply because it was the hon. Gentleman who raised this question—the flexibility to argue that they could spend such money in a better way to serve the needs of their community, rather than every penny being spent in the straitjacketed way that I indicated.

I should give some idea of the scale of spending, because many Members will not appreciate it. Let us consider total spending on public transport in 2001–02 for the country as a whole. LEA support for dedicated school bus services totalled some £630 million. Support for socially necessary local bus services, including the various support schemes, totalled £260 million, which is significantly less. Support for the London bus network totalled some £180 million, and spending on concessionary fares came to nearly £500 million. The bus service operators' grant came to £300 million, social services transport totalled just over £210 million, and non-emergency health transport came to some £160 million. Total public transport spending for 2001–02 came, therefore, to about £2.2 billion, of which nearly a third went on LEA support for dedicated school bus transport. This is an enormous amount of money, and it is right, in the light of wider consultation, for the Government to say, "Could we spend this money better? Could we enable LEAs to attack these problems more creatively, in order to deal with the real issues in every particular?"

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I want to follow up the point about the cost to local authorities. Staffordshire's figure for this year is more than £13.5 million. In the context of a total education budget of £450 million, that might not seem a huge proportion—until one realises that £400 million of that budget goes directly to schools. The amount that the local authority holds centrally is therefore a huge proportion: much more than a quarter of its entire budget for the whole education service.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes the point extremely coherently, as I would expect a former Treasury Select Committee colleague to do. His command of the detail is clear and he makes the case very powerfully. Should we just take the view, as many local authorities have had to do, that here is a wad of spending, and one cannot do much to move matters forward? Or we should we say instead that we are going to try to use that money for socially beneficial purposes, in the way that my hon. Friend implies, by attacking environmental and health issues?

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): I want to press the Secretary of State on a matter on which, I suspect, all Members will agree: the need to protect children with special educational needs. He has gone through the figures and created the impression that a lot of money is being spent, and he has implied that in his view it could be spent better. He will know that the House of Commons Library has reported that 65 per cent. of all money currently spent on subsidising free school transport is used to support children with special educational needs. Is he prepared to guarantee, by amendment to the Bill, that no parent of such a child who currently has access to free school transport will lose that access? Is he further prepared to guarantee that in future, as now, two thirds of all spending on free school transport will benefit such children?

Mr. Clarke: I think that I can help with the first guarantee but not the second. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that where such transport is required because of a statement concerning a child with special educational needs, it will be protected. If a clarifying amendment in Committee would help in that regard, I am happy to look at this issue in some detail. He correctly quotes a figure of some 65 per cent. for the country as a whole in respect of children with special educational needs, although it does vary from authority to authority. I cannot give a commitment that a certain fixed percentage will always be spent on transporting such children. In this as in other areas, it is necessary to look at what is the best way to use this resource, and my Department recently published further proposals for local authorities on the best way of doing that. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to point out that this is indeed an issue. It is a question of whether the best way to spend this money is on minicabs whizzing around the country, as currently happens, or whether more coherent use could be made of that resource.

On the hon. Gentleman's argument concerning fundamental rights—the rights of the parent who has a child with a statement—I can give him the assurance that he seeks. If we can provide greater clarity on that issue in Committee, I am perfectly happy to go down that route.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that my Committee is delighted that this Bill has been introduced. Does he accept that his point about special educational needs is particularly important because many counties are unable to provide the level of care, in transport terms, that they would like, and they do not have sufficient flexibility to introduce improvements?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. We explored that issue during the evidence session with the Transport Committee, and it is exactly why we need to establish the flexibility that will enable the particular and real needs of such children to be properly addressed. I appreciated the support of her Committee; she is not renowned for always supporting the Government, and securing her support on this occasion I regard as a tremendous achievement.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I listened very carefully to what my right hon. Friend said about children with special educational needs. Will he ensure that when this issue is dealt with in Committee, the debate, while dealing with the needs of such children, does not focus simply on children with statements? Otherwise, parents might be encouraged to seek statements purely to access transport. In fact, we are trying to move away from such a situation.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. I chose to use such language in answer to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) precisely because it is the statement that gives the legal right to which he referred. But in considering a proposal from any pilot authority, it would be right to look at provision for all children with special educational needs, whether statemented or not. Her general point is entirely in line with the direction of Government policy on special education across the piece.

I am sorry to return to this point and I may be overstating the case, but I do feel that the way in which this resource is currently being spent constitutes a real issue. We need to generate more flexibility for local education authorities to see what can be done generally—including, more particularly, for children with special educational needs, whether statemented or not.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): We are talking about special educational needs, but does my right hon. Friend also understand that there is a real problem with school transport in respect of what happens post-16? I realise that we are dealing with an LEA presumption here, but regarding wider social needs post-16 and special needs, where there is still a bit of a black hole that we are unable to clarify, will my right hon. Friend ensure that the learning and skills councils engage with the LEAs that are undertaking this particular set of projects?

Mr. Clarke: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. Indeed, I shall refer in a few moments to 16-to-19 provision. We come back to the central point once again. Do we want the straitjacket of the way things are, according to which decisions have to be taken, or do we want to say that if Gloucestershire, for example, were to produce a particular proposition for dealing with Stroud, we could look at the circumstances more flexibly and see what could be done?

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Will the Secretary of State tell the House how he envisages protecting Welsh-medium education, where provision is very patchy and children often travel 20 or 30 miles to access secondary schools?

Mr. Clarke: The requirement on Welsh-speaking education is the same as the requirement for those going to their first desired school in relation to a particular church. That will continue under the current proposals.

Private car use on the school run has doubled—I emphasise, doubled—in the past 20 years. We want schemes to change that and to encourage more cycling, more walking, more car sharing and greater bus use. Through that, we will achieve a range of benefits—environmental, health benefits for pupils, educational benefits stemming from pupils arriving fit to learn and better access to opportunities presented by the 14-to-19 curriculum. There are also social benefits such as improved social skills developed through travelling in groups and carrying forward those issues. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and other colleagues in the Department for Transport are working so closely with us on these questions. That is why we want schemes to support greener, safer and healthier journeys to school. That is why we want a Bill to enable LEAs to run travel schemes tailored to the needs of their particular areas.

To return to the point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), although the schemes will apply to children not above the compulsory school age, the prospectus will make it clear that we want local authorities to link their schemes to post-16 arrangements. We want the schemes to address issues surrounding the extended school day and after-school activities. By the way, that is a very important aspect of the development of the curriculum, because the fact that transport does not exist for some people seriously inhibits many schools from developing the extended day and out-of-school activities. We will address the 14-to-19 agenda.

The schemes will be required to address transport to denominational schools and, as I said a few moments ago, in respect of Wales, to English and Welsh-medium schools. We want LEAs to be innovative. We do not want to prescribe what LEAs should include, but we are aware of a number of important, positive emerging themes as a result of the overall discussion and debate. We are aware of the development of area-wide concessionary fare schemes, enabling weekend and evening use, as well as school use, of buses. We also know how inadequate public service provision has been tackled through dedicated bus services. There are also allowances for cycling and cycle loan schemes and we have also seen the use of some of the revenue generated to increase the number of school crossing patrols, escorts for walking buses and cycle training. There are a range of benefits, which we believe are important.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The Secretary of State mentions denominational education and he said earlier that he had the understanding of the churches. Would it be fair to say that he has their wholehearted endorsement for this legislation?

Mr. Clarke: No, that would not be right. We talked a lot to the Church of England and it would be fair to say that it is supportive of what we are doing. The Catholic Church had some concerns, which have been widely discussed, about particular parts of the country where there have been particular problems. I chose my words carefully when I said that we had the understanding of the churches, but if the hon. Gentleman is inviting me to say that we have their wholehearted endorsement, I cannot say that because it is not the case in respect of every part of the country in every circumstance. It is the case that the churches came to us at the outset to say that the current arrangements were not working as they should, so they invited a discussion about how best to proceed and what we should do. That is precisely the discussion that we have had. The solution that we have advanced—of allowing flexibility, particularly local government flexibility, which at least some Liberal Democrats favour—is, I believe, a good solution to the problems. Part of the local flexibility in particular local areas will result from LEAs talking to the churches about particular problems.

Scheme arrangements replace the existing legislation contained in section 509 of the Education Act 1996, which requires LEAs to provide free transport for school pupils where it is considered necessary to facilitate attendance. LEAs that volunteer, by applying to become scheme authorities, will make travel arrangements that they consider appropriate, for which they may charge affordable fares.

I want to make it clear, particularly in view of several remarks by Conservative Members, that this is not a cost-cutting device. The revenue from fares will be re-invested in the sort of improvements that I have just described. The expectation is that fares will remain heavily subsidised, but that removing the sharp divide—the almost arbitrary divide that currently exists—between free and full-cost transport will enable more equitable and wider distribution of subsidy and will allow scheme LEAs to target resources according to local priorities. The rhetoric of the Opposition parties suggests that they support that, but when it comes to the reality, they are not prepared to do so.

The Bill defines protected children—children from lower income families who will receive free transport when they attend the nearest school. We have defined a national minimum level of protection, but want local authorities to put forward definitions suitable for their localities, which is important. Similarly, we have maintained the definition of walking distance as the minimum guarantee. The purpose of school transport remains to ensure attendance, but the prospectus makes it clear that we expect local authorities to address the needs of all pupils—those living within and outside the walking distance. The Bill shows that that can be done in a variety of ways—through safer walking and cycling routes as well as by better bus provision.

To summarise this aspect of the Bill, where transport currently exists, LEAs will still be obliged to provide transport beyond the walking distance for children who are going to the school that they need to attend. For children from lower income families, LEAs will still be required to provide such transport free. Those will be requirements that will have to be addressed in any scheme that is proposed. Outside that, we argue that we need more flexibility and greater possibilities.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the utmost priority of the UK Youth Parliament over several years of debates has been transport. Can he confirm that he will encourage local authorities to engage in full consultation with their local MYPs and members of youth forums about these issues so that imaginative schemes can be developed?

Mr. Clarke: I can give my hon. Friend that precise assurance. Indeed, I have been lobbied to that effect by MYPs from Norwich and they raised the precise point that my hon. Friend mentioned. He is absolutely right that transport has been a matter of consistent concern over a long period. That is why I say we should use the substantial money that we now have to secure better results, better quality and better opportunities for young people.

Mr. Collins: The Secretary of State referred to the fact that the Bill provides for a continuation of free school transport entitlement for families on low income. Will he confirm that the definition remains that of families whose children are entitled to free school meals—namely, families whose income is below about £13,000 a year, which is well below the national average—and excludes the large number of families who receive the working tax credit?

Mr. Clarke: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we intend to keep with the free school meals definition. It is set out in the Bill and it is our intention, but I should say that there has been much discussion, as implied in the hon. Gentleman's question, about whether entitlement to free school meals provides the best definition of poverty. There are other approaches, as the hon. Gentleman said. We are prepared to consider alternative ways of defining it, but I can give the absolute assurance that the Bill works on the free school meals definition, which is the conventional one.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State will be aware that Barnardo's, the National Children's Bureau, the National Children's Home and others have warmly welcomed the Bill. One of their reservations was mentioned by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) a few moments ago. A further reservation is that LEAs must do more, as far as free school meals are concerned, to deal with the issues of stigma and awareness of entitlement. If we are going to use that definition, we need to overcome some of those difficulties.

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree, and I am very grateful for the general support that the children's charities have given this Bill. My hon. Friend is right to say that stigma is a major concern in relation both to free school meals and to transport. I assure him that we will try to ensure that schemes operate in a way that does not stigmatise.

As a further safeguard, all schemes approved by the Secretary of State or the National Assembly for Wales will have to consider the needs of all pupils. I give an assurance, in terms, that schemes that are purely cost-cutting will not be approved—that is unequivocally the case. We want to be as flexible as possible, to test the range of options and to keep the situation under review. For the optimists among us—I am certainly one of them—I am encouraged by the fact that the local authorities that have expressed an interest, whether formally or informally, are seeking not to cut costs but to improve the quality of their services. They know that they can innovate and do better, and that is what they want to do—even Conservatives, although I hesitate to say it to Opposition spokesmen.

The Bill includes a power to repeal if the pilots are not deemed a success, but it can be used only after we have had time to evaluate the schemes and have reported to Parliament, and it lapses after the evaluation period. If, as I consider far more likely, the pilots show the approach to be a success, the scheme approach will be open to all authorities that want to adopt it. It will remain voluntary, and if authorities want to continue under the current arrangements, they can. I emphasise yet again that it is a matter for local authorities to decide. Moreover, the Bill includes the power to relax the requirement in the Transport Act 1985 for local authorities to register closed services where a fare is charged. This will reduce the bureaucratic burden on local authorities.

This is a short Bill. It will introduce flexibility for the scheme authorities to address urgent cross-cutting issues of health, environment and safety. It is voluntary in nature, both during the pilot phase and in the longer term. It will enable local government to innovate and make arrangements that meet local needs in the 21st century. I repeat that it cannot be made statutory, the voluntarism cannot be removed, without primary legislation.

I believe that local government is at its best when it is at its most innovative, identifying local needs and taking on and responding to new responsibilities. With the Bill, the Government are saying to local authorities that they can design a system that is right for the schools, pupils and communities that they serve. Even at this late stage, I urge Opposition parties to abandon their dishonest opportunism and support their own colleagues in local government who want to build constructive policies for the future health and welfare of their communities. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): Let me begin with one of the few areas on which we may be in agreement: I agree with the Secretary of State that this is an important Bill with wide implications and join him in expressing thanks, on behalf of my party, for the work done by the Select Committees on Transport and on Education and Skills. I am sure that we will all draw on that work during this debate and, should the Bill get its Second Reading, in Committee. Unfortunately, that is probably as far as I will be able to go in cross-party agreement today.

Whenever the Government talk about modernising something, they end up wrecking it altogether, and, sadly, that is what is due to happen to the entitlement to free school transport under this Bill. For 60 years, children living long distances from their nearest school have had the right to use a school bus. For 60 years, it has not mattered how much their parents earn, how many siblings they have or whether they get a free school meal. The right has been simple: if the journey is too long, the bus will come along. Now, Ministers say that the right is a "legal straitjacket"—a phrase that the Secretary of State used repeatedly—and they plan to strip it away.

What will be the result? Yet more means-testing, yet more cost—hundreds of pounds a year—for families struggling to make ends meet, yet more problems for parents of disabled children, many of whom may lose out badly and yet more redirection of resources out of rural areas and into Labour's big-city heartlands.

Let me deal with one argument that the Secretary of State advanced in favour of the Bill. It is, he says, merely deregulatory. He asserts that it simply enables local authorities to volunteer. He also argues that, since some Conservative and Labour local authorities favour some or all of the provisions, our party should support it here too. It is strange for him to argue that no party can take a stance on an education issue unless every member of that party is wholly united behind it. He is, after all, the Secretary of State who pushed through top-up fees against the bitter opposition of rather a large number of his Back Benchers and party members. So let us dismiss that argument.

As for deregulation and setting local authorities free, it is an odd enabling of local government that gives councils no new powers or resources bar the power to levy charges for a service that has been provided free for six decades; but it has been a feature of the past seven and a half years that a declaration of a new freedom usually turns out to be a new tax, or what the Prime Minister prefers to call a "user fee".

We have five major areas of concern about the Bill. First, there will be many vulnerable people who will lose out, and lose out badly. More children will be forced to walk long distances in darkness and cold. Walking a mile or so along well-lit urban roads is one thing—perhaps it is the only world that Labour Ministers understand—but walking several miles up and down narrow, twisting, hilly and unlit rural roads in Cumbria or elsewhere is something entirely different. Do not the Government understand that in the Lake district, for example, the nearest school for many pupils may be a very long way indeed from where they live?

Mr. Charles Clarke: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that it is okay in those circumstances to walk 2.7 miles? Transport is now provided by law for those who live 3.2 miles away. What does he propose to do for those who live 2.7 miles away?

Mr. Collins: I favour providing a guarantee, as now, and as for the past six decades, that those facing long distances will, willy-nilly and irrespective of means-testing, have access to free school transport. Of course, I agree that providing better school transport for those who do not live quite such a distance away is desirable, but not at the expense of charging people for something that they have had for nothing for a very long time.

The Secretary of State has confirmed that parents on earnings well below the national average would, under the Government's proposals, if they want to spare their children such a long walk, be required to pay perhaps £400 or £500 extra for each child every year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Scaremongering.

Mr. Collins: It is not scaremongering. The Secretary of State has confirmed that, under the Bill, anybody earning more than about £13,000 a year could be charged for a service that is now provided free. That is well below national average earnings and the threshold for the working families tax credit. Many people receiving the WFTC, whom the Chancellor deems to be on low incomes, would lose entitlement to free school transport.

As many voluntary groups concerned with children with special educational needs have said, the Bill provides no specific protection for children with disabilities. I welcome what the Secretary of State said on this point when I challenged him. He went some way towards reassuring some of the groups, but I am sure that they would want me to press him further. He said that he would guarantee that children with a statement of special educational needs would not lose any of the entitlements that they receive under that statement and that he anticipated that those children would therefore continue to be eligible for free school transport, but he will know—indeed, some Government Members pointed it out—that many children with special educational needs do not have a statement. Perhaps he can clarify the point now, or perhaps we can tease it out in Committee, but the implication of what he said was that the rather larger group of children with special educational needs would not be provided with free transport under the Bill, even if they live beyond the statutory distance. Furthermore, he specifically said that he could not guarantee that two thirds of spending on school transport would continue to be for the benefit of children with special educational needs. It is important to stress that point, because the thrust of his argument in the early part of his speech was that large amounts of public money were being spent and he believed that that money could be spent better. If two thirds of the money that is spent now is for the benefit of children with special educational needs, it is proof that that money is largely well spent, not that it is being badly spent.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): If a more efficient form of transport were devised as part of an imaginative pilot scheme, which benefited the many and not just the few who benefit at the moment, it might be possible to deliver a successful scheme for children with special educational needs who are not on a statement and those on a statement at a reduced proportional cost in respect of the whole budget.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman invites us to believe that spending a smaller proportion of a relatively fixed budget on children with special educational needs would serve their interests better than they are served now. I am sceptical about whether that is what would happen.

The second major concern about the Bill is that it is based on a false analysis. The Government have given a seriously inaccurate account of how children get to school. The Secretary of State talked about the growth in the numbers of children who are driven to school. What he did not point out is that journeys to school by car remain a small minority of overall journeys. The Department for Transport's national travel survey shows that only 30 per cent. of children are driven to school and that proportion is falling, according to the most recent data. By contrast, nearly half—46 per cent.—of children walk to school and that proportion is both rising and officially thought to be under-recorded. A further 22 per cent. go to school by bus, train or bicycle and that proportion has barely shifted at all over the last decade. We must get the figures in perspective.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): Proportions always obscure detail. It is important to look at individual LEAs, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State suggested. For example, buses into Bristol this week had a clear road because the lack of cars going to school—because of half term—meant a 15 per cent. drop in congestion. Nationwide, the hon. Gentleman's figures may be right, but in specific areas use of the car is higher and a new and imaginative scheme could therefore lead to much greater falls in numbers on the road.

Mr. Collins: I shall come in a moment to congestion, what really causes it and what needs to be done to deal with it. The hon. Lady put her finger on what is behind much of the thinking behind the Bill. Much of what the Secretary of State said concerned national figures, but she is right to say that there are differences between different areas. That is the whole point. Because the present system is pegged to assistance for long journeys, the bulk of the money spent benefits children who live in rural areas, not urban areas such as those that the hon. Lady and other Labour Members represent. I suspect that that is what the Government do not like about the present scheme. We fear that the Bill is about a redirection of resources from the countryside to other areas.

While there is of course a case for further encouraging alternatives to the car for school journeys, it is worth noting that many more than two in three parents already use them. The practical steps needed to encourage further expansion of alternatives to car usage, such as better bike facilities in schools or greater co-ordination of bus and school timetables, do not require this legislation. The fear of "stranger danger", which leads some parents to resist any option involving their children travelling on their own, relates to worries about the state of our society and of our criminal justice system that will not be addressed in any way by this Bill. The Bill can be seen as both an over-reaction and a distraction.

We therefore question the real motivations behind this Bill. The suspicion is that it is in part an attempt by Ministers to appear to be doing something about congestion, which has indeed got much worse in urban areas in recent years. However, the figures show that that has little to do with school trips. Indeed, as the Labour-dominated National Assembly for Wales has said:

> "if charges were levied for transport that was previously free, then more parents might decide to transport their children by car."

Worsening congestion has far more to do with the fact that this Government have by far the worst record of investing in roads of any Administration in the last 200 years.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am listening to this nonsense with great attention. Has the hon. Gentleman talked to Conservative-controlled Cheshire county council? That council could explain to him, as he obviously finds it a difficult concept, that it is not the children of rural households who block roads, but people who live within a short distance of the schools, who for various reasons—some legitimate, some not—use cars when there are a hundred better ways to get their children to school.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Lady makes my point, not hers. The problems that she sees in her urban areas—and those that the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) sees in hers—have nothing to do with the provision of free school transport which, principally but not solely, benefits rural areas. In other words, if she believes that the Bill provides a solution to that problem, she reinforces our suspicion—articulated by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon)—that the Treasury will redirect resources from local authorities on the basis that they can now charge for school transport and from rural areas to urban areas. She said that there is a problem in urban areas and what happens in rural areas does not help. Something needs to be done, and she wants to redirect resources to do it.

Mr. Charles Clarke: If that is the case, can the hon. Gentleman explain why Conservative and Liberal Democrat leaders of county councils in rural areas support the legislation? I can give him names if he wants them. Why do those leaders support the Bill if what he fears could possibly come to pass? It could not: it is nonsense and a fantasy.

Mr. Collins: The Secretary of State says that, but he knows that many Conservatives in local government strongly oppose the Bill. He is right to say that some Conservatives in local government are quite interested in some of his proposals, although some of the people whom he believes to be in favour of the Bill have begun to revise their views. He might have meant Essex county council, which has expressed an interest in the Bill. It pointed out:

> "We would rather not make a charge, but that would mean the Government giving us considerable grant aid".

The Government have created a system that has so boxed in many local authorities that, no matter who is in control, they will look at any and every method of giving themselves a little more flexibility. It does not follow that Conservatives in the House have to take the same line, any more than the Secretary of State could possibly say that his party was unanimously in favour of top-up fees. If he contends that political parties should be unanimous on the issues, he hardly managed to deliver that on his flagship legislation earlier this year.

Our third concern about the Bill echoes the logic, although not the conclusion, of the Education and Skills Committee.

When it considered the draft Bill, it concluded:

> "The Government seems confused as to the objectives of its draft Bill. The Secretary of State has said that it will encourage more children to walk or cycle to their local school, yet this does not sit easily with Government policies to increase diversity in schools and to allow for the expression of parental preference: an approach that encourages greater mobility."

The Committee concluded, in effect, that the Government should keep the Bill and scrap choice. We urge them to do the opposite: make choice a reality and scrap the Bill.

The Committee is right to say, however, that Ministers cannot stick by both the Bill and their words on choice. For thousands of parents, perhaps ultimately hundreds of thousands, the Bill will make choice entirely unaffordable. They will have to send their child to the nearest school, whether or not that is their real preference, simply because it is the cheapest option for them.

[Mr. Collins]

Worse still, the Government explicitly acknowledge that those who choose to send their children to a faith school may lose out. The explanatory notes refer to article 2 of the European convention on human rights, which provides that > "the State shall respect the right of parents to ensure . . . education and teaching in accordance with their own religious and philosophical convictions";

yet the Government state in the notes:

> "However, in the Government's view this does not mean that there is any positive obligation to subsidise a particular form of education in order to respect a parent's religious or philosophical convictions. Consequently this Article does not of itself create any obligation to make arrangements for school transport or for free school transport to assist or enable parents to send their children to schools of their choice."

That means that, although at present about 80 per cent. of local authorities have provision for free school transport to denominational schools, under the Government's arrangements, such provision would be much less prevalent. Conceivably, it might disappear completely in some areas.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the cost of getting to and from school is a critical factor in deciding which school one's children should attend and how they should get there. Is not it rather odd, therefore, given that the marginal cost of using a car—if one happens to be lucky enough to have a car—is often less than the cost of sending the child by bus, that the Government think the measure a good way to get more people on to buses?

Mr. Collins: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is also right to remind the House that many parents, both in rural and urban areas, cannot run a car, or, because both parents work, cannot provide school transport for their children. For them the calculation would be straightforward: do they feel comfortable sending their children to walk what might be a considerable distance or are they prepared to pay several hundred pounds a year of their post-tax income on transport? The Government have not properly thought through the incentives and we could see many perverse consequences.

Mr. Fallon: Is not it equally possible that there will be a further perverse incentive? Parents who decide that they cannot afford to pay £400 or £500 a year may decide to change their work pattern and take their children to school by car, thereby negating the entire object of the exercise.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend makes the point that I quoted earlier from the National Assembly for Wales, a Labour-dominated authority, which said that that could indeed be the case. In relation to the effects from carbon and our Kyoto obligations on greenhouse emissions, the increased usage of the car in rural areas, which is likely at least to counterbalance any reduced car usage in urban areas, means that the net effect on global warming will be negative or unmeasurable. The Bill will not achieve the Government's objectives and, as my hon. Friend says, it could result in many more cars on the road in some areas.

Our fourth concern is that the Bill is, once again, a redirection of resources from rural to urban areas. Because the present system of funding school transport is based on distance criteria, it inevitably means that a large proportion of resources is directed to areas where significant numbers of children live several miles from their nearest school. We believe that that system actually reflects differences in need. A long journey is clearly more difficult and expensive to undertake than a short one. The Government are already providing far less funding per pupil for rural than for urban areas. That is at the heart of the cross-party campaign mounted by the F40 group of local education authorities, which seeks a fairer basis for distributing resources.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks has already pointed out the probable implications for the Treasury. The Secretary of State said something extremely interesting, which may result in a good debate in Committee. He said that there was no possibility at all—I think that that was his phrase—that the Treasury would use the introduction of charging in some areas as a means of redirecting resources.

The Opposition remember similar assurances from the right hon. Gentleman and from previous Secretaries of State for Education on whether the Treasury would take into account extra income raised from charging tuition and top-up fees. None of those assurances turned out to be worth the paper they were printed on. If the Bill receives a Second Reading, we shall attempt to do in Committee what we tried to do with the Higher Education Act 2004, and include a requirement for the Treasury not to redirect resources as a result of the introduction of charging. I suspect that Ministers will say, as they did then, "We can't accept that amendment, but don't worry, just trust us." Then, a few months or years down the line, it will turn out that they are doing exactly what we expected.

Our final major concern is that, although the Bill is often described by Ministers as merely an enabling mechanism for a few pilot areas, it actually includes a provision to make its changes permanent and, in all probability, universal. The Secretary of State referred to clause 3, which covers the power to repeal new provisions and accurately described what could be done if the Government concluded that pilots had not succeeded. What he did not point out, but which is clear in the explanatory notes, is that, as they state, if a repeal order

> "is not made the new provisions will continue after the pilot is competed and there will then be no limit on the number of participating LEAs."

The system could thus become permanent and there would be an expectation that LEAs would volunteer for it, and we anticipate that there would be Treasury pressure for them to do so.

Although the Secretary of State mentioned a number of organisations that he believed were supportive of the measure, a large number have expressed concerns about some or all parts of it. The National Governors Council said:

> "Affordable fares are a must and free school meals are not necessarily a good indicator".

The Secretary of State indicated that the Government might think again about making free school meals the determinant and I very much hope that they will.

David Hart, the general secretary of the National Association of Head Teachers, said:

> "This will cause uproar amongst parents. They will ask whether this is the beginning of an attack on free education. It will be deeply unpopular and could be extremely expensive for those with several children."

John Dunsford, general secretary of the Secondary Heads Association, said:

> "This moves away from the principle of free education for all."

I shall quote from only one of a string of head teachers of individual schools. Ann Rogan, head teacher of St. Andrew's primary school, Fontmell Magna, said on the "Westminster Hour" last weekend:

> "I think probably what brought it home to me was . . . talking to a set of parents who had moved and were actually going to need to buy a second car in order to bring their child to school if the free bus places were taken away."

That is the point. We are talking about something that will have a massive impact on the quality of life and living standards of large numbers of people, many of whom are not even remotely wealthy.

I have one final quote. Margaret Morrison of the National Convention of Parent Teacher Associations said:

> "It's definitely going to be the rural families who don't have a choice . . . it's quite an anomaly isn't it, government are telling us to remove cars from the roads and yet they allow councils to make a provision that is no doubt going to increase the number of cars on the school run."

As recently as July, the Secretary of State indicated that he was undecided on whether to proceed with the Bill, telling the Select Committee that he was concerned that there was no cross-party consensus to proceed with it. He is right about that: there is no cross-party consensus to proceed with it. Let me make it emphatically clear to him today that Conservatives will oppose the measure vigorously.

The Bill will hit some of the weakest, poorest and most vulnerable in our communities; it will impoverish tens of thousands of parents and, yet again, disadvantage rural areas. It fatally undermines the principle of free education for all. The Bill should not have been introduced in the first place. We urge Ministers to think again and we shall fight the Bill tooth and nail until they do.

Roger Casale (Wimbledon) (Lab): I welcome this Bill. It is modest, sensible, practical and long overdue, and it will allow local authorities such as mine in Merton to experiment further with reducing traffic on the school run through the introduction of safe cycle routes, walking bus schemes and so on. That should be encouraged.

I am at a loss to understand why the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), the Opposition spokesman, and his party should have chosen to oppose this sensible measure so rigorously. For three reasons, their opposition will ring rather hollow. First, the Conservative party had plenty of opportunity when in office to deal with this matter, yet did nothing. The hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that it was a virtue that there had been no change, modernisation or reform in more than 60 years.

Secondly, a Conservative Government would not be able to afford even the modest £50 million that is expected to be needed for this measure's introduction. The Opposition's current education budget proposals mean that the money would not be there. Thirdly, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, many Conservative local authorities around the country are looking forward to this Bill. It is a great shame that we are not able to achieve a measure of cross-party support even for a measure as sensible as this.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman said something extraordinary—that a Conservative Government could not afford even £50 million from their schools budget. Is he not aware that my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has committed the Conservative party to increasing school spending, not just by £50 million, but by £15 billion a year by the end of the next Parliament?

Roger Casale: This is not a debate about the Opposition's education budget. All sorts of incredible and incompatible claims have been made, and we shall see what their actual proposals turn out to be.

The Opposition's claims about this Bill ring hollow. It is a pity that we cannot achieve a measure of cross-party support for a measure as sensible and practical as this.

Although I would not say that the Bill has a deficiency, we should take this opportunity to address a number of issues that I believe merit cross-party support. In particular, there is a need to do much more for the parents of children with special educational needs, and for the children themselves. Safe transport between home and school must be secured for those children.

This debate provides an opportunity to consider the difficulties that still exist, in Merton and many other local authority areas, with the safe transportation of children with special educational needs. The Bill might offer a suitable vehicle to reform the regulations governing this area, and I look forward to exploring that possibility further in Standing Committee.

I should like to share with the House some of our experiences in Merton, and the difficulties that we have encountered. The problems are a source of wide concern and have been raised by various organisations. In preparation for this debate, Mencap wrote to me and many other hon. Members to make the point that many families with children with a learning disability experience difficulty in accessing appropriate transport to school. Along with the National Autistic Society, Mencap is concerned that the Bill makes no mention of the special transport needs of disabled pupils. That is why I felt it very important to add my voice to the debate on these matters, and to examine whether this Bill is the right vehicle for reform.

At the end of 2001, I was approached by Mary Powell. She is the mother of an autistic daughter who attends Merton's very good St. Ann's special school. Her daughter is transported between home and school by minicab. All sorts of problems have arisen in connection with that transport, which involves a minicab, a driver and an escort to ensure that the child is not left alone in the car. We should remember that children such as Mary Powell's daughter have great difficulty in expressing themselves, which makes it very difficult to know what happens during the journey between home and school.

[Roger Casale]

On one occasion there was a 25-minute delay, and longer delays have been reported. Naturally, that caused concern among parents, and Mary Powell contacted me to say that she had raised those concerns with Merton council. However, the council had not been able to say where her child had been for those 25 minutes, even though the problem had recurred over a period of weeks. During that time, Mrs. Powell noticed that her daughter had become distressed, but she still had no clear explanation of what had happened. In her letter to me, Mrs. Powell said that her daughter was autistic and had learning disabilities and that she was unable to tell anyone about what happened on the school journey. In fact, there are many more examples of what Mrs. Powell called "dangerous practice".

Mrs. Powell did the right thing and got together with parents of children with similar difficulties who shared her anxieties. The parents formed an SEN network and raised their concerns with Merton council in an appropriate way, but found it very difficult to get the council to take action. Indeed, they found it very difficult even to secure a meeting with the officers concerned. It was not clear where the responsibility lay and, although I do not question their good faith or want to suggest that they were not trying to do their best, there was a tendency on the part of those officers to put their heads in the sand. It is possible that they were not sure how to address this difficult issue, or perhaps they did not have the resources to resolve it.

In addition, the parents found it difficult to arrange a meeting with the directors of social services and education. It was difficult to get anyone to acknowledge that there was a problem, but once it was acknowledged that a problem existed it was difficult to get anyone to take responsibility or to act. Over a long period of time, the parents saw no improvement in the situation.

One of the biggest difficulties—and one of the parents' greatest concerns—was that many of the minicab drivers and escorts involved in the transportation of their children between home and school were not being properly vetted by the police. In fact, Mary Powell and her colleagues in the SEN network conducted a little experiment: they telephoned the minicab company contracted by Merton council to provide the service in an attempt to get a job as a driver. They recorded the conversation, and when they asked about police checks, the minicab firm told them not to worry about it. That increased the parents' concern.

I think that the House will agree that that is bad practice and that it needs to be stamped out. The difficulty experienced by Mary Powell—ultimately, it is the reason that she came to me with this matter—was that there is no way of knowing where responsibility in this problem lies, nor how the problem can be solved.

Whose responsibility is it to make sure that police checks are conducted and followed through? Would not it be better for the local authority to provide the service, even though there may be substantial cost implications? In that way, the authority could assure itself that minicab drivers and escorts were properly vetted and that they provided an appropriate level of service.

In the end, I had to get involved. I had meetings with council officers, but it took a long time to arrive at a plan of action. Progress was made only when I was able to bring the matter to the attention of Ministers. Those Ministers included Baroness Ashton and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Frequent meetings were held involving the Department for Education and Skills and Merton LEA, and they led to a review being conducted.

The difficulty, however, is that the law talks not about regulations but about guidelines. If a local authority is having difficulty or failing to meet the guidelines, it is difficult to see where we can go for redress. Ultimately, by working together, engaging in the review and committing ourselves to introduce improvements, changes have been made. Drivers and escorts are now required to have badges. The local authority has redrafted the policy document on SEN transport. Reviews and surveys are being undertaken, and it is examining the feasibility of becoming a minicab operator itself.

Three years on, it is still a problem; all of us, including the local authority, have acknowledged it. Janet Yerbury, who works for the local education authority, said at a recent meeting with parents of children with special educational needs:

> "It is an issue that can keep you awake in the middle of the night. Where we are completely stuck is that we cannot carry out checks on other mini cab employees . . . It is something we are still trying to improve upon."

There is a tendency to think that all the good work that is going on in improving social services and education always takes proper account of the needs of special educational needs children. Unfortunately, my experience is that we have failed to do so effectively. We must examine whether we need to tighten the law, introduce stronger regulations, especially on the safety aspects of transport for children with special educational needs, and provide the appropriate resources so that councils cannot hide behind the claim that they are unable to act properly because they do not have the money. The most vulnerable children are those whose rights we must do most to protect. There is a tendency to think that because of their vulnerability they will be properly looked after. Sadly, in many cases they are exactly the people who are left out.

I support the Bill. I understand that it is not aimed directly at the transportation of children with special educational needs, but rather at how we get people out of cars and find alternatives for them to get to school. I also understand that it is a modest measure that is aimed at certain pilot areas. However, we should examine—perhaps we can come back to this in Committee—whether the Bill provides a vehicle to address the serious deficiency in the law that led to the situation that I described. That problem exists in many other authorities and has proved difficult to do anything about.

At the same time as introducing the measure, can we also make the necessary changes to the law so that there is no question of anyone failing in providing the right level of transport and safety for disabled children? My constituent Mary Powell and other parents of children with special educational needs would like that to happen. I think that my local authority would now like that to happen, and we are working together to improve the situation, but it is difficult. Mencap and other such organisations also want the law changed. I hope that the Government will listen to our representations and see how we can address the issues during the passage of this sensible Bill.

3.3 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): On the surface, the Bill is modest, consisting of seven clauses and five pages. It creates an illusion at first sight of not doing much, but it is potentially dangerous—just how dangerous it is depends on the shape of future regulations, which are something of a moveable feast.

The problem, with which we all identify, is the increased volume of school-to-home transport. Hon. Members are acutely aware of the school run in both urban and rural constituencies. There is the additional problem, which the Government must confront, of the increased cost of public transport, both regular scheduled services and contract services that are provided directly to schools. As has been said, many large families find it easier to bundle the children into a car, which is certainly more financially worth while, than to put them on the bus. The increased cost to LEAs of providing transport drives some of them to curtail discretionary support for things such as denominational school transport, and there have been many celebrated cases in connection with that.

Following the Government's agenda, there is the increased probability of challenge to LEAs and increased demands on them for transport. Surely the specialist school programme creates the opportunity for parents with a child of special ability to argue plausibly that the nearest school is not the appropriate school—a point that the Select Committee made. Of course, there is the increased problem, which we have all identified and discussed, of childhood obesity and the fact that children are not as active on their way to school as they once were.

Those are the problems. We all share them, know what they are and seek to address them. The Government's solution is to authorise school travel schemes and to permit pilots. Doing both together is a neat move because if the pilots fail on a score of criteria there is nothing to stop the Government encouraging roll out across the country, although I stand to be corrected on that. There are only two essential features that any scheme must have. It must not charge protected pupils and it must have Ministry approval. The scheme does not have to be a good scheme. It does not have to meet quantifiable targets or measurable environmental successes, to increase public transport use or to reduce congestion; it merely requires ministerial approval.

Bizarrely, almost all of what the Government envisage and hope for in the Bill is already well within the capacity of most local authorities. Most of what has been talked about and what the Minister vaunted is being done in different places by active local authorities, save the capacity to opt out of existing arrangements that followed earlier legislation and to charge for what once was free. That is what the Government call flexibility.

With that new flexibility for local authorities comes—this is perhaps just as bad—indirect encouragement of local authorities to roll back from discretionary commitments to faith schools and disabled pupils just as we are becoming a more multi-faith society and more disability conscious. What will the new charging regime guarantee? There is no guarantee that it will increase travel by public transport, reduce car use or increase the capacity of parents to exercise choice, but there is a guarantee that some local authorities will have more money. They will have a monetary advantage compared with other LEAs. I think that that will be followed up by a move towards the child pays system, which will disadvantage a range of individuals, such as children who reside far from their school, children from large families and children in rural England.

The reality—I think we all suspect this and feel it in our bones—is that charging will eventuality become the norm. The Bill is simply the thin end of the wedge.

Mr. Beith: Does my hon. Friend accept that to encourage people not to use their cars in urban areas, any charge for new school transport for people close to a school would have to be very low? The only resources that the local authority could plunder to keep that charge low, apart from the charge itself, would be higher charges or much lower costs for getting rural children to school. The Minister gave no indication of how local authorities such as Northumberland and Cumbria, with large geographical areas, could achieve that objective at substantially lower costs. The only answer must be that children will be charged a lot more.

Dr. Pugh: There is no evidence that charges will be low or, for that matter, will stay low. There are administrative costs associated with implementation of the charges.

Fundamentally, the Bill removes entitlement. The Minister has a nice word for that. He calls it a legislative straitjacket. It removes an entitlement and introduces the possibility of a charge. It means asking families to resolve the problem that they do not directly create.

Like most problematic measures that the Government think of—the congestion charge is another example—they by and large sell it to local authorities as local autonomy. I have to say that it is not real autonomy when the Government have tinkered so much with other aspects of education that directly impinge on transport, such as the structure of schools, admission and curricula arrangements and attendance times. We can argue anyway whether there should be autonomy and diversity among LEAs in delivering basic entitlements. After all, health trusts are not allowed to vary prescription charges, and nobody would argue for that.

That, in a nutshell, is my analysis of the Bill. It would be bad enough if it were just my analysis, but it is not. The Secondary Heads Association says that it is very concerned about any charging in rural areas, and states that the measure will do nothing to improve attendance. The National Association of Head Teachers says that it "potentially undermines parental choice", and it > "will not be surprised if parents vote with their feet and transfer to cars."

On a pedantic note, I am not sure how one votes with one's feet and transfers to a car. The NAHT says that the Bill totally undermines other Government strategies. In a damning verdict, the general secretary of the Secondary Heads Association says:

> "It knocks one prop from under free state education."

[Dr. Pugh]

Those comments are hardly surprising when there are about 150,000 primary school children who live more than 3 miles from school, and 83 per cent. of them will be debarred from free transport if charging is universally employed by local authorities. More than 500,000 secondary school children live more than 3 miles from school, and 85 per cent. of them will be excluded from free transport if all local authorities charge. I accept that that is a worst-case scenario, but as I pointed out, we may well get to that.

What would that do? If one assumes an average of 1.7 children per family, the switch to car use could result in 337 children going by car who might previously have gone on a free bus. Putting it another way, that is 75.5 million extra trips on the road. If one has a definite environmental tinge to one's thinking, one could think of it as 7,550 extra tonnes of CO_2 emissions. Those are the possible effects of the Bill, so it is no wonder that the Transport Committee claimed that the Government "fails to consider school transport as part of a wider transport system".

I have given the views of head teachers. There are also the views of the voluntary bodies: Barnardo's and the National Children's Bureau are concerned about the effects on disabled and SEN pupils. They are also concerned—we all share this one—about how the pilots will be monitored and evaluated. We see the presumption in what the Secretary of State said earlier that almost any pilot will be agreeable as long as it is within the basic parameters. Voluntary bodies express the worry, which we have heard before, about larger families. They welcome wholeheartedly the commitment of the Greater London authority and Transport for London to free travel for all children.

The National Autistic Society is worried about autistic children being "increasingly vulnerable to less favourable treatment".

The only solution to its predicament would be a guarantee that transport needs will be written into SEN statements. However, that would run counter to the Government's strategy to move away from reliance on statements as a way of dealing with special needs and to concentrate instead on amicable negotiations between parent and school. The NAS demands that the basic entitlement on grounds of disability be written into the Bill.

I could go on; the Bill's opponents are many. Despite the understanding that apparently exists between the churches and the Government, the Catholic Church is concerned that the social mix of its schools will be adversely affected, laying them open to the accusation that they are not choosing from the full range of pupils. The Catholic Church worries, as I suppose it might, about the effect on, and the choices that will be made by, larger families, suggesting that most tend to use a car for school travel.

The Bill simply does not have enough friends; it has few takers. Why? The explanation is relatively simple: it provides no certainty about environmental gain; it provides no certainty about congestion reduction; it provides massive uncertainty about people's future entitlements; and it provides absolute certainty that there will be charges. The tragedy is that free school transport has the best take-up of any benefit, even better than free school meals. It is almost invariably taken advantage of when it is offered, and it automatically ensures less congestion, less pollution and a safe journey to school. Nothing in this Bill does that.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Bill. The Government are being incredibly brave—some would say foolhardy—but somebody, somewhere, some time has to do something about the problem of school transport. The collective view of Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen is, "Sorry, we haven't a clue." In neither submission did I hear a suggestion.

One can oppose and criticise, and one can say that the Government are being opportunistic, but in this case I have to say that they are being anything but opportunistic. This is not an easy subject; it is a minefield. We all know that we are going to get letters because there will be some losers. Sadly, however, there are already many losers under the existing system, as I shall explain. The Government are right to look at this matter.

We want constraints on the pilot schemes. I can say from the outset that my local authority in Gloucestershire is not looking to be a pilot. I know because I have asked it, although it may change its mind. I can speak freely because I cannot in any way fetter its views. The authority has done a great deal of research on this matter. As the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen managed to prove between them, it is easy to find the problems but much more difficult to look for solutions.

I genuinely think that this is an enabling Bill; it is about pilot schemes. The Government have tried pilots in the past, and where those have worked they have gone headlong into extending them, rather than trying more pilots. I hope that they will learn a lesson from that, and that they will try to learn from the experiences of the different schemes.

Inevitably, we have talked almost exclusively about the bus versus the car, but one of the good things about the Bill is that it allows other things to be considered. The view is that school transport is principally about motorised forms of transport, but many children walk to school. I am not sure where Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen got their figures from, but the figures that I have seen show a gradual decline in the number of children walking to school. Interestingly, the number who cycle bobs up and down between 2 and 4 per cent. The latest figure for those who walk is 44 per cent., but that has fallen from over 50 per cent. seven or eight years ago. That is not down to the election of the Labour Government; it is the result of a change in culture that means that people see themselves as more dependent on the car. We all know the impact that that has on people's health, let alone on congestion.

My first accusation about those who do not want to see any attempt at change is that they view the past as a different country. I cannot believe that what is happening in my local schools today is radically different from events in the local schools of Opposition Front-Bench spokesman.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to speak to those who do not want to see any change, but there are no such people in the Chamber. Most of us want some change, but we do not necessarily want the charging that the Government envisage.

Mr. Drew: I want to see exactly how the measure will work out and, if chosen to sit on the Standing Committee, I shall try to be my usual, helpful self and to scrutinise the Government's proposals carefully. However, it is a mistake to view the Bill as saying that charging is a wonderful way to sort out school transport. There are many other aspects to the matter, not least the fact that we have a pot of money that is reasonably limited, unless we are going to spend even more of our education funding on moving children around, which most of us would agree is not a good way to get the best out of the funding. We shall have to suck it and see.

It seems that there is an historic view. Now, however, many of the primary schools in my constituency are beginning to run after-school clubs. There are also breakfast clubs. They would like to get back into providing sporting activities. As I said in my intervention on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, we are doing our level best across the political spectrum to get more children to stay on at school post-16, or into college post-16. One of the great unfairnesses is that a pupil of lower means can go from having free school transport up to 16, only to find that because he or she wants to go to college, transport is no longer free.

Stroud college is not in my constituency—it is in the area represented by the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown)—and the student may live in Wooten-under-Edge. They then have to pay exorbitant charges, if they can get to the college at all, to travel by bus on a circuitous route. We must have regard to the 14–19 curriculum, and even more so to the post-16 curriculum. As I have said, there are great unfairnesses.

I welcome flexibility but I shall set out where I do not see room for change. I am a Christian and I support denominational schools. I welcome people who choose to send their children to a school of their faith, and they should not be discriminated against for doing so. I look to the Government to provide clarity and to tell us how they will ensure that pupils at denominational schools are not adversely affected.

In a sense, there has always been a problem with the idea of choice. More often than not, people of lower means have had to go to the local school. That is because they have not been able to pay for transport. If the local primary school is 2 miles away or if the secondary school is slightly less than 3 miles away, there will be charges. That has always seemed to me to be very unfair.

There are even more bizarre situations. For example, two families may live on the same street. The children of one family get free school transport and the children of the other family, because they happen to be slightly closer to the school—we measure distances as the crow flies—are subjected to charges. It is difficult to provide an explanation. We use a blunt instrument to measure who is entitled to free transport and who is not. The Government are right to examine the issue. We know that there are increased costs.

We must be careful about special needs, and I want some assurances. I have seen the benefits of inclusion. We saw the closure of a moderate learning disability school in my constituency. The closure was generally well received because the heads of all the other schools worked together to ensure that there was general inclusion. It was not popular in all sectors of the community but, largely, the programme has worked. I do not want to see the proposals before us tied in with inclusion policies. That should be a separate argument, to ensure that there is appropriate choice. If children are entitled to receive special needs education at an appropriate special needs school, transport should not become discriminatory. I hope that assurances will be provided. I hope also that the detail will be provided in Committee, and that we shall see strengthened the provisions set out in the Bill.

Other matters are worthy of debate and, as I have said, I hope that there will be clarification when we consider them in Committee. In a sense, this is a local-versus-central debate. The parties are somewhat split, not necessarily in this place but outside it. Some local authorities will be looking for more discretion in the way in which they operate. There are great unfairnesses in the way in which the system works. I have referred to the measurement of how far a child is from a particular school. There is also the issue of entitlement to free school meals.

There are examples of how things have gone ludicrously wrong. Although it is easy for me to make a cheap party political point, I will do so. I dread Septembers. They have become better in the past couple of years, but it is September when the children go back to school. In the Strouds of this world, bus companies can often hold education authorities to ransom. As a result of deregulation, there is a state of anarchy. There have been children in my constituency at bus stops, in the morning and at night—this has been during the first few days of September—who were completely unclear about whether a bus would pick them up. That is because of the last-minute haggling that takes place, with the bus company saying that the subsidy is not enough. I know that this issue is outwith the Bill per se, but I am asking for greater flexibility.

There is the issue of children travelling longer distances by bus to their schools, but we must ensure that children who travel shorter distances are able to use effective transport. We know that they are the ones who will get into their parents' cars to be dropped off at school. We must make the bus system work better. It does not work at the moment because of the mass of bus companies and the lack of co-ordination. There must be co-ordination in the wider arena so that the general public, who also will be using some of the buses, are made to feel welcome on them. The behaviour of children must be appropriate and good enough. We must try to get the best of all worlds.

If we are to deal with global warming, the greatest challenge is transport. Unless we get more people to walk, to ride or to use public transport, we are, to use that immortal word, doomed. We must do what we can. That is why I welcome the Bill. It has been easy for the Opposition to score points. It has been easy for them to pick out parts of letters. I have read letters where scepticism has been expressed by churches, charities and teacher unions. However, the totality of their contributions is that there are many worries and we do not want to see the proposal as a precursor to charging. At least the Government are brave enough to be considering that option and they are right to consider a series of pilots. It is to be hoped that a sufficient number of authorities will examine what they are willing to do.

I am prepared to extend the benefit of the doubt. I want assurances in the areas that I have outlined. Even more so, I want additional resources so that the system can work. If we find that the system is working because of those resources, we would be sensible to make a wider move. We should take a hold of the underlying social policies of school transport. There are genuine economic issues and we should see these proposals as a way of introducing a more rational use of public transport, including voluntary transport.

When children in my constituency do not go to the nearest school—I am sure this is true in other constituencies as well—their parents may club together and hire minibuses, taxis and so on. Such arrangements should be properly scrutinised and evaluated to see whether we can introduce alternatives to something which, I am sure all hon. Members agree, is not working terribly well. I hope that the Bill receives its Second Reading and that we look at its details carefully. We should add red lines so that denominational schools and special needs education do not suffer, but the Government are right to introduce the measure.

3.29 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who always makes constructive and thoughtful speeches, and has brought a rural and an urban perspective to bear on the matter.

I welcome the opportunity to clamber aboard our Second Reading debate and make a fairly short journey. Having served as Secretary of State for Transport, I am sympathetic to some of the strategic objectives mentioned by the present Secretary of State in his introduction to the Bill. A far-sighted transport strategy aims to iron out peaks and troughs to achieve better use of our road network. The school run has a dramatic impact on transport and is a conspicuous peak—particularly in the morning, although less so in the afternoon—so it makes sense to iron it out. There are good transport reasons as well as good educational reasons for looking at the problem.

The Secretary of State seemed to imply that nothing at all had been done in this field before 1997, but I recall working closely with my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on an initiative called "Safer routes to school". We worked with local educational authorities, transport companies and Sustrans to achieve some of the objectives behind the present Bill. We tried to work with the grain and understand why parents were cautious about allowing their children to walk, cycle or, in some cases, go to school by bus. We tried to persuade people to change, rather than hector them, and we used grants to underpin parts of the initiative. I remember visiting a school in Birmingham where bicycle sheds had been funded by a grant from central Government to promote cycling to school.

I also looked at the planning system. A popular school in Hampshire wanted to expand because parents wanted to send their children there, but the planning authorities were concerned about the traffic implications. Before consent was granted, there was a dialogue with the school, parents and teachers to see whether a transport plan would reduce the percentage of journeys made by car and thus prevent expansion from aggravating congestion in the neighbourhood. Lateral thinking is useful in minimising the problems caused by journeys to school.

Mr. Kidney: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the good thinking that took place before 1997 has continued. Locally, for example, Weston road high school partnership for safe routes to school regularly sends me minutes of its meetings and achievements, and residents are very enthusiastic about that initiative. Nationally, the Government last week announced £10 million for safe routes for schools and the joining up of cycleways. All that good work still continues.

Sir George Young: I am delighted by the hon. Gentleman's consensual approach, and I am glad that some of the pioneering initiatives introduced by the Conservative Government have been built on. One's memory is never perfect, but I do not recall anyone in my Department saying, "Minister, you can't do this, because the law does not allow you to do so". That, however, is the implication behind the Bill.

I am very much in favour of the flexible and voluntary approach that underpins the Bill. I only wish that the same approach would infect other Government Departments in their relationships with local government. Local authorities, for example, have been told that they must have Cabinet government, and the planning system has been told how many houses it must provide. That dirigiste approach by some Departments sits uneasily with the more consensual and voluntary approach adopted by the team who have introduced the Bill. I am in favour of the pump-priming underpinning the Bill, which provides an incentive for people to participate in the pilots.

I am a keen cyclist and, indeed, I bicycled to the House this morning. I hope that the pilot authorities that promote cycling will make sure that cycle training is undertaken at schools and that children who bicycle to school are encouraged to wear a helmet.

There is one particular aspect that I thought the Secretary of State glossed over in his speech; the tension between parental choice of school and the transport imperative to make better use of the bus. The Select Committee on Education and Skills highlighted the evidence that he gave to the Select Committee on Transport, which was that the main aim of the Bill was to encourage people to attend their local neighbourhood school. The Committee felt that that interpretation sat somewhat uneasily with the Government's other policies on diversity of schools and parental preference, which would lengthen journeys. I am not quite sure how the Bill takes the trick of getting more people to take the school bus while promoting a much more complex network of journeys from home to school if parental choice is achieved. Perhaps the Minister can address that point.

Much of the debate has been about the principle of charging. If I were asked to die in the last ditch to defend the principle that children of all families, however well-off, should continue to go to school free, I am not sure that I would voluntarily so expire. None the less, a number of points have been raised in the debate that the Government need to answer. There are inevitably some bureaucratic problems associated with charging that simply do not exist if journeys are free. My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) raised a legitimate concern about the not-so-well-off who might get caught. There is also the perverse incentive mentioned from the Liberal Democrat Benches, whereby introducing charging for a journey that is currently free might get somebody off the bus and into the car. Other points were made about how the introduction of charging may penalise those who live in rural areas.

There is another potential tension that I am not sure has been addressed. During the Labour party conference, a new vision was launched for our schools whereby they would operate not just from 9 o'clock to 3 o'clock, but from 8 o'clock to 6 o'clock, in order to accommodate those whose parents both work. I am not quite sure how that vision of the school sits with the imperative to get more children to go to school by bus. If school starts at 8 o'clock rather than 9 o'clock, will two buses make two journeys, or will the bus assist only the child who starts at 9 o'clock, rather than the one who starts at 8 o'clock? There are some tensions to which the Government have not responded about how the objectives of the Bill can be reconciled with some of their other objectives.

I should like to make a final point about road safety and seat belts in particular. The Government's view is that it is ultimately for schools and local education authorities to ensure that vehicles are appropriate for the type of journey planned, including seeing whether they are fitted with seat belts. Some of my constituents in Shipton Bellinger are deeply concerned that the bus that takes their children to school has no seat belts. If those parents drive their children to school, they can ensure that they wear seat belts. If they send them on the bus, they cannot do so, because the bus has none.

I wonder whether the Government will have a dialogue with the authorities that take part in the pilots, and whether they will be encouraged to use newer and safer buses. I note that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), is nodding vigorously. Some of the buses are straight from Cliff Richard's "Summer Holiday" in the 1960s, and I hope that the pilot schemes will promote new buses that pollute less and are safer.

I understand the objectives behind the Bill and I hope that they will be achieved. I think that there are some unanswered questions. I am not volunteering to serve on the Standing Committee, but I hope that the questions that I have posed will be raised by colleagues when that Committee sits.

3.39 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I was just thinking about the reference to Cliff Richard, and I thought that the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) has, like Cliff Richard, been around for a long time, still looks very young and is still listened to with great seriousness by lots of people. This is consensual politics.

The difference between the volume of weekday traffic in Stafford when the schools are in session and the volume when the schools are on holiday is noticeable. Huge congestion occurs on school days, especially in the mornings, yet hardly any occurs in the school holidays. The difference during school holidays is so noticeable that it has become a common topic of conversation among my constituents, who comment on the benefits such as shorter journey times to work and more punctual buses. People are also more relaxed at those times because the traffic is less difficult. Although some hon. Members have not mentioned it, I guess that that is the typical experience all around the country.

Last year's Department for Transport national travel survey said that at 8.50 am on school days, about one in five vehicles on the road is taking children to school, which shows the school run's huge contribution to congestion. Constituents often say that the answer is to reduce the reliance on the school run. Anybody can see the benefits to the country of reducing the reliance on the school run: journeys would finish on time more frequently; congestion and standing traffic would decrease, which would also reduce emissions of greenhouse gases; and children would be safer when travelling by road. If some children were to change from the school run to walking or cycling, it would also benefit children's health. There should be a consensus on helping 100 per cent. of youngsters to get to school safely and affordably—Opposition Members have concentrated on the one tenth of pupils who currently benefit from free school buses.

I shall describe the change over six decades since the Education Act 1944 and explain why the law is out of date. I shall rely on my several years' experience as a Member of Parliament working with the community in a part of Stafford called Doxey, which happens to be 2.9 miles away from the nearest school—I found that out from many years of correspondence with Staffordshire LEA. That distance means that youngsters are denied access to a school bus to take them to school for free, although youngsters who live in the villages just down the road, which are 3.1 miles away from the nearest school, are delivered to school by a free bus.

It would be inappropriate to discuss the difficulties that those youngsters face in getting to school, which include the routes that they take when they walk, the dangers that they face when they cycle and the irregular and not necessarily straightforward public buses. I have corresponded with the LEA for several years about those difficulties, and it is a matter of justice and equity that such people should have access to a scheme for transport to school.

I have a happy story to tell: a long time ago, an enterprising LEA—Staffordshire LEA—decided to take a stake in the school bus market. In 1998, it bought its first seven US-style yellow buses and started to run them for itself. Incidentally, it was mightily annoyed when, several years later in 2001, a Government news release boasted that the first yellow bus scheme in the country had been set up in Calderdale. By 2001, the buses had been running, apparently unnoticed, for three years in Staffordshire. I do not know whether

[Mr. David Kidney]

Staffordshire LEA set up the first scheme in the country, but it is proud of its enterprising decision.

Another eight buses were added in 2000, and a further 15 were added in January this year. Because Staffordshire LEA has a stake in the market, it has a certain control over the delivery of the service for its pupils, whereas in the past it would have been at the mercy of the private sector on prices and conditions. In an emergency or when problems arise, the ability of the local authority's directly controlled buses to step in provides more flexibility.

The modern buses—the last 15—have not only the highest safety standards but are increasingly friendly for disabled pupils. The modern buses have wheelchair lifts and dedicated places for wheelchairs with proper attachments so that pupils can travel safely in their wheelchairs. We should boast about those good safety features on yellow buses.

When I read the Library research paper—which, again, is of a high standard—for the Bill, I was reminded of a point that the local authority made. There is a specific law in the United States, where the buses are widely used and more than 50 per cent. of pupils go to school by yellow bus. It provides that, when the school buses are stopped for pupils to alight, all the traffic must stop. The Bill affords a good opportunity to introduce a similar law in this country, ready for the yellow buses that will perhaps be more prevalent if the measure becomes law, and local authorities take up pilots and buy them.

I shall briefly explain the benefit to local authorities of yellow buses. I have mentioned the stake in the market in the context of competition and security of supply. That is helpful in benchmarking not only prices but quality. There are benefits to students and parents in the form of safety and security. The buses have a modern safety specification and dedicated and trained bus drivers, whom the pupils get to know. The good relationship between them means that bad behaviour on buses is much reduced.

All the pupils have their own seats in which they are safe. They and the driver have a sense of ownership of the vehicle that solves some of the conflict and antisocial behaviour problems about which we hear from time to time. Yellow buses provide the reassurance of fewer casualties than on journeys by car. Why not extend those benefits to more of the nine tenths of the school population who do not benefit from the current Act, which was passed in 1944?

Local education authorities have considered acting under their discretionary powers. I have a cautionary tale from Staffordshire, which explains why, although Opposition parties carp, no one can do anything about it unless the Bill is passed. In 2002, the local authority decided to extend the benefits of free school transport to more pupils. It wanted to undertake pilots in one rural and one urban area of the county, notionally reducing travel distances for walking to 1 mile for primary schools and 2 miles for secondary schools. It asked the Government for some cash to help run the two pilots. The Government refused on the ground that it was too costly; the local education authority said that it would not proceed without Government money and nothing happened. For all the Opposition's fine words about the schemes, no one will devise a different scheme that will benefit pupils such as those at Doxey.

There will be no change to the 1944 settlement, even though most people criticise it, unless we allow the Bill to proceed; unless, when the Bill is law, local authorities devise a variety of new ways of providing safe and healthy transport instead of the car, which takes so many pupils to school; and unless we learn from the pilot schemes which one works best.

It is important to stress that no local education authority will be made to take part. In the prospectus, if not the Bill—perhaps we need to examine that in Committee—residents must be consulted before a scheme can go ahead. The key result of the scheme must be a modal shift from car use. That might involve a shift to bus use, but it could also involve walking, cycling or even, in some cases, the use of fewer cars as a result of a car-sharing scheme.

I would love to be able to go back to the community in Doxey next year and say that there is now a prospect of extending a school bus service to the schoolchildren who live there, but first I need to vote for the Bill. Then, if it becomes law, I shall need to persuade the local education authority in my area to consider bidding to take part in one of the pilots. I shall enthusiastically support the Bill. It is a permissive Bill that will provide evidence over the next few years on whether there is a better settlement for the 21st century than the one provided for by an Act passed in 1944.

3.50 pm

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): My party welcomes the aim of reducing car use and promoting walking and cycling, for obvious environmental and health reasons. We want to see a better organised and integrated system of school transport, and we welcome the role that the National Assembly for Wales will play in implementing the Bill, if it passes. We hope that the Assembly will take full advantage of any opportunities that might be presented to it in that regard. The Conservative Front-Bench spokesman noted earlier that the Assembly has already remarked on the peculiarity of the Government's position, in that they appear to want to promote the use of public transport by charging for it. In the Assembly's view, and in mine, that is a strange contention.

Despite my first words of welcome, we are worried about the Bill on several counts. First, we are worried about the impact that charging will have on low-income families, of which there are many in my constituency and the rest of Wales. I find it strange that the Government are introducing a system of charging that will inevitably impact on some low-income families because, to be positive, the Government have taken some welcome steps to help such families over the past seven years. For example, they have introduced the minimum wage, working families tax credit and a number of other measures that have had a useful effect, especially in rural Wales. Now, however, they are taking a step in the other direction. I am worried about the difficulties that low-income families will face in scraping together a lump sum, if that is what is required when the charging is implemented, especially when their weekly income is very low.

A lot has been said about bus transport today, but I do not think that anyone has mentioned the use of rail by school students. I want to make a special plea for the Cambrian coast line, which terminates in my constituency. It is a wonderful line, with wonderful views and friendly staff. It carries about 700 school students a day, and the continuation of the line depends on its continued use by such students. Any disincentive to use the line for school transport would have an effect on the community in general.

I am also concerned about a measure that could be seen as an extension of means-testing, whichever way it is implemented. It has already been noted that school meals entitlement is hardly the sharpest of instruments to use in deciding who should be exempt from any charges. I hope that the National Assembly for Wales will have the opportunity to use other, more effective, criteria, and I look forward to that happening.

The potential effects of the Bill on families with children who are disabled have already been mentioned. In Wales, many disabled children use mainstream educational provision. They do not travel long distances to special schools but go instead to mainstream schools. In rural areas, however, that mainstream provision can still involve journeys of much more than 4 or 5 miles. I worry about possible disincentive effects of the Bill in that regard.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Like the hon. Gentleman, I represent a rural area in Wales, as well as some urban areas. My local authority spends more per head on school transport than any other in Wales and perhaps even in England and Wales. Surely, with the financial pressure on education authorities, they are being tempted to charge more and more for school transport so that they can provide the level of education that people living in those areas require.

Hywel Williams: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that point. I am not sure whether there will be a direct relationship between charging and the provision of education; we shall see. However, it is significant that the lowest incomes in Wales are to be found in Powys, where his constituency is, which is also where there is the highest car use and a high level of bus transport for schools.

I intervened earlier on the Secretary of State in respect of the Welsh language, and I want to make a couple of points about Welsh language education in Wales. There is a certain provision of Welsh language education, much of which is in urban areas in Wales, in the south-east valleys and the north-east. Many school students travel long distances to access Welsh-medium schools, typically by bus rather than by car. Those who access Welsh-medium secondary education have been shown to be working-class children from valley communities who aspire to being bi-lingual in a way that their parents are not.

I understand that the National Assembly might be able to protect that transport provision, and I asked the Secretary of State about that. He referred me to the provision for denominational schools. I had a quick look at the explanatory notes, paragraph 27 of which states that

> "this does not mean that there is any positive obligation to subsidise a particular form of education in order to respect a parent's religious or philosophical convictions. Consequently, this Article does not of itself create any obligation to make arrangements for school transport or for free school transport to assist or enable parents to send their children to schools of their choice."

Perhaps the Minister will address that point in his wind-up, and reassure parents in Wales that they will be able to access Welsh-medium secondary education as they choose.

My last point is in respect of the urban issue, which a number of hon. Members have addressed. As I said, the National Assembly has said that it is peculiar to charge in order to promote the use of public transport. The Secretary of State gave the game away in his opening remarks, as I think the record will show, when he said that the Government's aim was to reduce congestion in our towns and cities—full stop. There was not a word about rural areas. However laudable the intention to reduce congestion in towns and cities, that should not be at the cost of provision in rural areas. Perhaps you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for misusing a quip made by Senator Kerry during the current election campaign: it is a little as though, after the attack on Pearl Harbour, the USA had invaded Mexico. I can see the impulse of that joke—why should rural transport suffer because of urban congestion?

As I said, there are rural areas in Wales where poverty is clearly implicated in low standards of living for children. On its establishment, the National Assembly for Wales devised an index of multiple deprivation, which is one of the best things that it has ever done. Because that index has a measure for rurality embedded in it, rural communities, for the first time, start appearing high on the list of deprived communities. For example, in terms of housing, the community of Aberdaron in my constituency, which previously did not appear in measurements of housing poverty, suddenly came first out of 750 wards in Wales because the measuring system is much more sensitive. As I said earlier, Powys is high on the list of deprived areas. Wages are lower, services are further away and, unsurprisingly, the level of car ownership is the highest in Wales. The most cars are owned where incomes are lowest. The earlier index took car ownership as a measure of prosperity, but in this context it could almost be described as a tax. That is the nature of rural poverty in Powys, Gwynedd and various other parts of Wales.

My constituency contains six secondary schools, in Bryn Refail, Caernarfon, Penygroes, Pwllheli, Porthmadog and Botwnnog. All those schools require students to travel not just 3 miles, 2 miles or 2.85 miles, but up to 15 miles. I worry about children whose families are not above the threshold for the purposes of school meals, but are not well off by any means, although they may be running two cars.

I look to the Government to reassure us that they will take account of such issues, and I look to our colleagues in the Welsh Assembly to do the same.

4.1 pm

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), who made some interesting and thoughtful points about what I consider to be a straightforward and admirable Bill. It is also admirably short, which would please me were I to end up on the Standing Committee. I am glad to note that it aims to improve health, the environment and safety, and that—as has been pointed out—it is in an enabling Bill: it devolves decision-making powers to local authorities, rather than our imposing a one-size-fits-all solution from Westminster. It also builds on action that the Government have already taken. In April they committed £7 million to local education authorities to pay for school travel advisers, and, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), only this week they provided £10 million for the extension of the national cycle network to schools.

At the heart of the Bill is a problem that all Members should acknowledge, and to which we should all offer constructive solutions. I am sad that the two main Opposition parties have failed to offer any such solutions. At present, free school transport is for the few—10 per cent.—and not for the many. Considerable expense is involved: in Dorset the cost of providing school transport is £8.3 million, from a total LEA budget of £24 million. That is not just poor value for money; it does nothing to address the problem of school run congestion.

An excellent research paper supplied by the Library states:

> "Over the past 20 years the number of children being driven to school has almost doubled. Now almost 40 per cent. of primary school children and more than 20 per cent. of secondary school children are being driven to school each day, and most of the journeys are less than 2 miles. At 8.50 in the morning during term time, about one in five cars on urban roads is taking children to school."

We must do something about that.

Many speakers have referred to an urban solution creating a rural problem. Let me tell them about a constituent of mine who lives in Worth Matravers, in circumstances similar to those described by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. It is a beautiful rural village, which I recommend to all Members. There is a marvellous pub called the Square and Compass. The village is about 2.9 miles from Swanage. The constituent who came to see me was on the minimum wage, working in Swanage and receiving work-related benefit, but did not qualify for free school meals. His two children had to face a walk, with him or his partner, down a very narrow unlit country road in order to get to school. As any Member naturally would, I pursued his case with the local education authority to see whether flexibility could be shown, and whether the criteria might be extended to allow his children to get free school transport. However, it simply was not possible. I certainly welcome the possibility of helping the many people who live within the 3-mile limit but at such a distance from school that it is not possible safely to walk there. We should all support the extension of affordable, decent school transport to such individuals. We certainly need a solution to the problem, and this Bill offers LEAs the flexibility to devise their own.

I want to refer mainly to the Purbeck area of my constituency, of which Worth Matravers is a part. It is largely rural and currently has a three-tier schooling system, consisting of a first school, a middle school and the main Purbeck school, at Wareham, for post-14 education, although there are some who choose to use the grammar schools in Poole. As a result, a mix of children end up being bussed hither and yonder, especially from Swanage, which is larger than Wareham. All children over the age of 13 or 14 spend about an hour a day on buses to and from Wareham.

Unfortunately, both Dorset and Purbeck are run by Conservative administrations, whose attitude towards buses and public transport in general is such that they cut services after 6.30 pm, creating many problems for those who want to get home after taking part in after-school activities in Wareham. The new X53 service, which serves the world heritage site coastline that we are all so proud of, does not go to Old Harry Rocks, at the start of that site, or to Swanage. The only imaginative scheme to have emerged is a community transport scheme in Swanage. I instigated it, and a Labour councillor—a fairly rare commodity in Swanage—called Cherry Bartlett developed it. I hope that the imagination that Cherry and those working with her have shown will spread to the Tories in county hall, and that they will want to take up one of these pilots.

The lack of transport is a profound problem for the whole population in that area, but for schoolchildren in particular, and the falling rolls that our schools have to deal with will only exacerbate it. I have discussed before in this Chamber the problems associated with the provision of affordable housing, and with second home ownership in particular. Many families can no longer afford to live in the Purbeck area; as a result, school rolls are falling. The LEA is therefore consulting on moving from a three-tier to a two-tier system. Whatever happens as a result of that consultation, we will have fewer schools in the Purbeck area. If the LEA goes to a two-tier system, more of the smaller rural schools will probably close. There is a desperate need for an imaginative solution to the school transport problem in my area—a problem that underscores my enthusiasm for Dorset using its corporate imagination in applying for a pilot.

Mr. Rendel: I am confused by the hon. Gentleman's comments. He says that his is a rural area and that the distances between schools are likely to increase in future as some are closed. How, therefore, will charging people for the first time for bus services covering greater areas decrease the number using cars and increase the number using buses? It is surely clear that the opposite will happen.

Jim Knight: What I am saying is that the LEA will have to find some imaginative solutions. Currently, there is no real choice for those living in rural areas. They have to use the school for which they can get free school transport, pay a lot of money for an alternative, or take their children by car. I am interested in finding imaginative solutions that take into account a range of possibilities, including an affordable flat rate that enables people to exercise choice and access the school that they want for their children. For example, I am interested in the use of staggered start times for schools in that cluster, so that we can integrate transport more carefully. I am also interested in the use of walking buses in Swanage. Such a development has begun at the middle school and I was pleased when the Prime Minister's wife paid a visit to help us launch it last year. I would like to see more cycling in the area and greater use of safe routes to school, particularly in Swanage.

It was interesting to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford about his constituents' experience of yellow buses. As he described it, it sounded like a dedicated fleet that offers all sorts of solutions for a local authority to think creatively about, such as integrating transport across schools and improving supervision. When I talked to some of the operators of yellow buses, they mentioned their ability to alter the routes in order to pick everyone up along the way and to find out what might have happened if someone does not turn up at the bus stop. That offers potentially good advances in respect of supervision of children and child safety.

The dedicated fleet could, perhaps, also be used in turn during the summer holiday when there are many visitors to the Purbeck area, a popular tourist destination. It could be used for park-and-ride schemes to take people to the beach or even to deal with antisocial behaviour. There are already interesting examples of some of our more difficult youngsters being taken by the police on outward bound-type courses to burn off some of their excess energy in a more constructive way. Dedicated fleets of vehicles used for school transport could be used imaginatively in the public interest to help with some of those problems.

Obviously, there are concerns about charging, but it is up to the LEA to make the calculation. The Conservatives recently consulted on the bizarre idea of imposing a congestion charge on tourists wanting to visit Purbeck as a means of tackling the summer congestion. I thought that that was a potty idea by the Conservatives at the local county hall and I made some representations accordingly. I am not saying that I support every form of congestion charge or road pricing, but it is interesting that one Opposition party supports the London congestion charge but opposes the charges in the Bill and the other supports road pricing but opposes the Bill. I see no consistency beyond a bit of political opportunism.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us what level of charging for school transport he would support?

Jim Knight: I would be interested in seeing an appropriate improvement in the service, which people would value enough to want to pay a little extra for. The yellow bus service, for example, might be so valued by some parents that they would gladly pay more for it. I have spoken so far mainly about the Purbeck area, but in Weymouth, where I live, a probable solution for a more urban area would be a concessionary bus fare scheme that would be available to everyone in particular groups. Currently, there is a concessionary bus fare scheme for pensioners—the Government have ensured that all pensioners have half-price bus travel—and for disabled people, so it would be interesting to explore the idea of having a concessionary bus fare scheme in semi-urban areas perhaps for young people across the board to enable them to access clubs, sporting activities and so forth.

I have sought to illustrate the merits of the flexible approach that the Bill offers. As I said, I would love to see more imaginative ideas coming from Opposition Front Benchers, who have offered only criticism and nothing constructive about how to deal with the real problems of congestion and school transport in this country. I support the Bill vigorously and I hope that Dorset will, in turn, manage to find imaginative solutions to clear up the school transport problems in my constituency.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I follow the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), but he leaves me somewhat confused. He spoke about the Conservatives failing to produce any solutions; for his part, he talked about other people finding imaginative solutions, but I did not hear any such solutions from him that would solve the problems. The only imaginative idea that I heard was the excellent one proposed by Dorset's Conservative county councillors to charge visitors for going into a special part of his constituency in order to contribute to subsidising the bus service used by local people. I would have thought that that was an excellent idea.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman represents a very beautiful part of the country that attracts a lot of tourists. Would he favour a congestion charge for people visiting Hadrian's wall, for example?

Mr. Atkinson: I would certainly see some value, if it was practical, in asking visitors to make a contribution, when that is for the benefit of the local community. I do not see anything wrong with that. It is an imaginative idea, and I would be happy to discuss it. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman could find a way of charging visitors to enter the city of Carlisle. Ken Livingstone does it in London, after all.

I shall certainly vote against the Bill because, as one sees Labour Ministers introducing legislation over the years, one begins to identify the ways in which they present Bills. This is a classic new Labour Bill, presented by the Secretary of State as surrounded by worthy ideas: it is to reduce congestion in cities, make the atmosphere cleaner by keeping us off the roads, make us healthy by encouraging us and our children to walk to school, even tackle obesity, someone said. In fact, however, the Transport Committee had it spot on when it identified it as a method of charging people for something that they currently get for nothing. Paragraph 45 of the Committee's report clearly states:

> "The Bill will allow LEAs to charge parents for school transport for children".

I shall vote against the Bill because it singles out people who live in rural areas such as my constituency and who depend much more on school transport than people in urban areas. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said that about 22 per cent. of school journeys are by car, but my guesstimate would be that in Northumberland the figure is much lower. Because journeys to and from school are much longer than in urban areas, buses are far more important, especially for couples who both work and cannot take the time to run their children to school.

[Mr. Atkinson]

In my constituency, the journey to school can be more than 30 miles. Some of my constituents' children board weekly at the high school because the distances are so great. If they are charged for the journey, it is sure to amount to a substantial sum. The average cost of transport per ordinary, not special needs, pupil in Northumberland is between £400 and £500 a year, so logically that must be somewhere near the sum that they will be asked to pay, which will be a very heavy burden indeed.

As a lot of us in the House are old and grey, we bang on about pensions but sometimes forget the time when we were starting out in life and having children. At this point, I should apologise to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), who is neither old nor grey—yet. Children are an expensive accessory to life these days, and getting more expensive all the time. In Northumberland and other rural areas, average incomes are much lower than in cities. Of course, there are people who commute from their lovely country homes, but for many people in the country life is a bit of a struggle.

For the first time, young people from families with lowish incomes are staying on in the sixth form and then going on to further education, putting yet more expense on those families. Any further burdens on them, such as the Bill imposes, will be very damaging.

Mr. Beith: In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, as in mine, there must be families of shepherds and agricultural workers who have to ferry children a mile or two along a farm track in the Land Rover before they are met by a taxi, paid for by the county, which takes them another 5 miles to a bus, which takes them the next 10 or 15 miles to school. The thought that those parents should have to pay a charge, when they are already making a significant contribution in time and effort to that school transport, seems totally unreasonable.

Mr. Atkinson: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Our constituencies are in the same county and we encounter the same problems. Members with rural Welsh constituencies also encounter those problems. The Bill will mean a hugely expensive burden for people on very low incomes.

The hon. Member for South Dorset talked about imaginative solutions. I have racked my brains to think what Northumberland county council could do differently. It is Labour-controlled, so I hold no particular brief for it. It also proposes to move from a three-tier education system to a two-tier one. Northumberland is a large rural area and the same sort of buses will have to transport the same children down the same roads. If the council charges for school transport, it will encourage more people to drive their children to school rather than put them on the bus. One of the features of rural life is that car ownership is high. Low-income families who would not in other circumstances have a car, or would have only one car, need one or two cars—the second is often old and expensive to run and maintain—because it is the only way that they can get about. If a charge is applied, the number of children on the buses will fall and costs will go up. The Transport Committee worked out that a charge of more than £1 a day would cause school bus use to fall. That would be a problem for Northumberland county council, which would face increased costs and the law of diminishing returns.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) suggested that the Treasury would seize on the Bill as a way to reduce the money spent on education. The Secretary of State pooh-poohed that suggestion, but we know that that is what the Treasury will do. If LEAs have the ability to impose a charge, the Treasury will expect them to do so. If they do not impose a charge, that will ultimately be reflected in the grant they receive. That is as certain as day following night.

Northumberland was a pilot area for the introduction of the education maintenance allowance of some £30 a week. That was very successful to start with, except that the county council then said to anybody over 16 that they now had to pay for their school transport. Another feature of charging that affects lower income families is the discounts for the length of ticket purchased. An annual ticket is cheaper than a monthly, weekly or daily ticket. Therefore, the families with the least money, who cannot afford an annual ticket, have to pay more than those with the most.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) pointed out, the bulk of school transport cost benefits those with special educational needs. As the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) will know, counties such as Cumbria spend, on average, £6,000 per pupil with SEN a year. Northumberland spends just over £5,000. That is a huge amount but the Bill will do nothing to change that. The Bill will place a heavy charge on rural families who can least afford it. It will ultimately reduce such choice as rural families have in education terms. It is ill thought out and offers none of the imaginative solutions that the hon. Member for South Dorset kept mentioning. Therefore, we are right to oppose it.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to speak on Bills of this kind. I listened with some trepidation as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State used the word "deregulation". If there is one word that I do not like to hear in connection with buses of any kind, it is deregulation. To those of us who purport to represent rural areas—my rural areas, although they include some 42 villages, are nothing compared with some of those we have heard about today—the deregulation of buses was not the greatest thing to happen. In north and central Essex, it meant, first, that the supply of bus services diminished and, secondly, the cost to the taxpayer increased immeasurably. The word "deregulation" is not greatly encouraging and if I may offer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State some humble advice, perhaps a better word might be used in future.

The Bill is certainly not the nightmare that has been depicted by the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats. Any scheme that is proposed will have to be approved by the Secretary of State and if it were as black and scary as those portrayed by some Opposition Members, I am certain that my right hon. Friend, or any successor, would not approve it.

The Education Act 1944 was a great opportunity for working people, especially those living in rural areas. I am not of such an age that I know what happened before 1944 and how children of secondary age actually got to school. There must have been some transport provision, and I would guess that it was made at the discretion of county councils operating in the best interests of those who lived in their area.

Although 1944 was only a year before I was born, it seems a different age. At that time it was much easier to walk along a country lane. I say nothing of rapscallions or ruffians; I am talking about the flow of vehicles on the roads.

Mr. Beith: There were two other important differences before 1944. The first is that, certainly in my constituency, there was a school in every hamlet and every small village, in walking distance for most people. Secondly, most children left school at the age of 13 or 14.

Mr. Hurst: Indeed. Towards the end of the period, the school leaving age had reached 14 and secondary schools had been established.

If our forebears thought it sufficiently important to provide free school transport in 1944, how much more so now, when the dangers on the roads are so much greater and many roads and lanes are so inaccessible? I am sure that my right hon. Friend introduced the Bill because there has been a chipping away at the spirit of the 1944 Act over the past 10 to 20 years. Essex county council, which was referred to earlier—unfairly favourably, I think—has been chipping away at the Act's provisions in implementation.

In practice, not many years ago, even children in the county aged over 16 who met the distance qualification would have received assistance for transport to school. It was not until last year, when I was fortunate enough to secure an Adjournment debate on the subject, that those who attended denominational schools in the county received free school transport, yet the present administration has chipped away at that and begun a charging regime. It was not long ago that children up to the age of 11 gained the same advantages under the legislation as those aged eight. Over time, that provision has been chipped away.

It is said that the provision of transport is expensive. The figure for the whole country is about £600 million a year, but, as has rightly been pointed out, two thirds of that is spent on transport for children who attend special schools and for those who have special educational needs. Members on both sides of the House have said that there will be no interference with that provision and that it will remain sacrosanct, so the amount of the budget spent on those who do not attend special schools or who do not have a statement is about £200 million a year. When I read that last year, or the year before, the Government spent £13 billion on computers, £200 million seems a small amount for something as important as home-to-school transport.

Another problem is that county council officers, some of whom in an earlier age would have been explorers in darkest Africa, love studying maps to show how children in village A no longer qualify as there is a shorter route, or because it had been wrongly measured on an earlier occasion. In my area, there was a campaign, led partly by me and partly by the late and much-missed Liberal councillor for the village of Rayne, Tony Meadows. In 1971, a new high school was built and to persuade the villagers of Rayne to send their children to it, the council said it would provide transport. School transport was provided between 1971 and the mid-1990s, then someone in the county council measured the route and found that it came to 2.8 miles. As a result the transport was withdrawn. However many times Tony Meadows and I walked those lanes, we were not able to make the distance greater than 2.8 miles: indeed, a new piece of road reduced the distance to 2.7 miles, which made our case even weaker. However, the route was not safe to walk. No sensible person would walk along it on a darkening December evening. The county council said that it was all right as long as children were accompanied, but drivers of oncoming vehicles would not see pedestrians in the road if they were dazzled by the headlights of traffic coming the other way in the gathering gloom. The lanes are becoming more dangerous every year.

The great people at county hall have a wonderful enthusiasm for geography, and the same must be true in other county councils. Sometimes they discover that it is possible to find routes that are shorter than those used hitherto. The most astounding example that I came across when I served on the county council concerned the route between the village of Silver End and the town of Witham. Generations of children had enjoyed free school transport along those roads, but someone at county hall discovered from a map that some old tracks and lanes led across fields. Measurement showed that those tracks' total distance was less than the road route—

Mr. Kidney: As the crow flies.

Mr. Hurst: My hon. Friend says as the crow flies, but it is more like as the weasel runs. The road route was clearly more than 3 miles, so the field route became the designated route.

People have to have a clear track to follow, so those of us who thought that the route was not suitable for children, whether or not they were accompanied, decided to walk along it.The route began in a dark and overgrown avenue of trees that gave out on to open land. Heavy ploughing meant that inches of mud accumulated on children's boots by the time they reached school, and the route also crossed various ditches and a stream.

On that walk, we had the great advantage of being accompanied by a lady who is now a leading spokesperson on education in the county of Essex. I know that at least one other hon. Member in the Chamber today knows the lady to whom I am referring, and we were able to show her how unsatisfactory the route was. Until then, she and her colleagues had maintained that it was perfectly suitable. However, we came to a great gaping ditch about halfway along, and that caused this lady county councillor to say that she had made up her mind and that the route was not suitable.

County hall officers are always looking for ways to exclude routes that hitherto had been considered suitable for free school transport. That is the problem, and I think that county councillors need to be more astute when it comes to using their judgment about what is suitable for this purpose.

In some ways, this Bill is a lost opportunity. It is not terrible, and it does open up other options, but local authorities that do not wish to take advantage of what it offers can stay with the present statutory scheme. While that scheme persists, free school transport will still be available, although authorities that wish to explore other possibilities can make application to that end to the Secretary of State.

What we need to do is clear enough. We should retain the present statutory scheme and the option of providing free school transport over the sort of distances that have become hallowed by time should remain enshrined in law. Given the great big budgets required to run western Governments these days, it does not seem unreasonable to devote as much as an extra £100 million to this purpose. That would mean that the amount of money spent on non-special schools and non-special needs children would be increased by 50 per cent. That would make a colossal difference to the numbers of children who can use free school transport. It would help the problem of road congestion enormously and greatly reduce air pollution—and all for £100 million. I know that it is not my money, although I am a taxpayer so part of it is mine. What is a relatively small sum in the overall scheme of things would make an enormous difference to the transport and education structure of our country.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I feel that I should contribute to the debate because the Secretary of State did not understand the problem as it confronts people in rural areas such as Northumberland. He regarded those who were anxious about it as "dishonest", a word that is scarcely in order. He does not grasp the problem.

The Secretary of State and Ministers will explain that the Bill introduces pilot schemes, but lying behind it is the worry, rightly expressed by the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), that before long it becomes an assumption that local authorities should be carrying out a pilot scheme and, if they are not, their funding in the local government grant system should be affected accordingly. That decision will not in practice be taken by the Ministers on the Front Bench, but by Ministers in the Treasury or Ministers who succeed them. At some point, the pressure is likely to mount.

For the Bill to be acceptable to people living in areas such as Northumberland, there has to be a powerful statutory guarantee that under no circumstances can the statutory right to free school transport for children living a long way from school be removed. We do not have that guarantee. Instead, the Secretary of State believes that he is offering people in Northumberland something wonderfully new—flexibility—that will enable school transport in Northumberland to be organised differently.

I understand the motive behind that. In some urban areas, it may be possible to balance the interests of those who live a mile and a half from school with those who live 3 miles from school, and to get a system of local school transport that, at a relatively small charge, might be attractive enough to get some people who use cars to take their children to school to use the school bus instead. But that is a world away from the situation in somewhere such as Northumberland, where a large proportion of children are entitled to free school transport. That is very expensive for the county council because the distances involved are long and in some cases the journeys are complex. I explained in an intervention that it sometimes involves a combination of buses and taxis in addition to the help given by the parents to get the child to the public road, which may be 2 or 3 miles away from where they live. The school transport process is expensive.

It is impossible to imagine how the supposed flexibility could enable Northumberland to do something that it has not been able to do so far, which is to find a way of transporting children to school from remote locations at minimal cost. Frankly, there is no way of doing that. The numbers involved in each journey tend to be relatively small and the cost of providing for them is large. Nothing that the Bill enables the county council to do will remove the difficulty of that task or make it cheaper to carry out.

The only thing that the Bill could do is encourage Northumberland to set up a scheme in which this expensive process also has to have added to it the provision of free school transport for children in urban areas who live close to school. The total cost would be met out of a combination of a charge and the existing expenditure. If that is attempted, there is no way in which it could be done over a county such as Northumberland at a charge that would encourage anyone to take their children to school by public transport if they had any choice in the matter. The costs simply do not add up. They are too large in a rural area.

It has been pointed out that the local authority in Northumberland is planning changes that will increase the number of journeys that are eligible for free school transport because it will increase the number of children between nine and 11 who, instead of walking to the middle school, will have to be transported to a high school 10 or 15 miles away. There are arguments on both sides, which the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) knows about because I have exchanged many letters with him on the subject, but one of the disadvantages of the change is that it increases the school transport bill by more than any gain made at the first school. So another group of parents and another two years of the age range become the subject of free school transport and, under the proposed system, they become the subject of charging if Northumberland introduces such a scheme.

People in Northumberland view the scheme not in the abstract, but on the basis of experience because over the past few years charges have been introduced for the education of young people between 16 and 19. We are seeing some pernicious consequences, including some young people who are reluctant to continue with courses because they are imposing on their parents the burden of the transport costs of getting to school or further education college, both of which are often a long way from home. Many of those families have not only 16 to 19-year-olds but younger children, and when one of these schemes comes into force, they will face a transport charge for each child.

People are not impressed to be told, as Ministers have said in letters to me, "Oh, it's all right because someone in the 16 to 19 age group can meet the cost from the education maintenance allowance." Of course, they are not all entitled to that, and those who are say, "How is that fair? The allowance is supposed to enable young people to go on courses, to buy books and to meet ancillary costs. All the others can use it for that, but I have to use it to get to school." There is a sense of injustice and unfairness surrounding the allowance because it is now a school transport allowance for some, but for others it is money available for other, helpful educational purposes. It is no answer to the problem.

People in Northumberland see the danger that the county may be under increasing pressure to take part in a scheme, and if it does children who now get free transport for the long distances to school will not get it in future, so the same people who suffer all the other disadvantages of life in rural areas, such as the difficulty of taking part in after-school activities, will face extra costs. The supposed flexibility to which the Secretary of State refers offers no means whatever of reducing the cost of transporting children in rural areas the long distances to school. At no point in his speech or in any other that I have heard has an answer been produced that would enable Northumberland to provide the school transport that people need at less cost than at present.

Every September, I find myself involved in many correspondences and disputes between parents and the local education authority about the proposed school transport arrangements for their children. Usually, the dispute takes the form that what the LEA is suggesting involves an hour and a quarter journey to school and an hour and a quarter back, because of several changes of taxi and bus. I approach the county council, which says that it has to try to restrict the cost of the scheme, and if the child shares a taxi or spends part of the journey on a bus, that reduces the cost. The result is an unacceptably long journey, beyond the statutory times.

Year after year, the county tries to restrain the cost of school transport, but in practice there is no cheap way of providing it. Schemes of the kind envisaged in the Bill cannot work in a rural county such as Northumberland, and if there is increasing pressure to introduce such schemes, rural families will suffer greatly instead of receiving their current entitlement to have their children transported to school without charge.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I oppose the Bill. It is presented as being optional, but in reality local education authorities will be forced by budgetary pressures to implement it.

Choosing the right school for their children is a major decision for parents: I remember it and the anxiety that accompanied it very well. One of my daughters has just completed the application form for one of her sons to transfer to secondary school, so I am experiencing for the second time round the anxiety of waiting to see whether the school that has been allocated is the one of choice.

All parents want their children to have the best possible start in life, and their choice of school is made with that in mind. All sorts of reasons contribute to their choice. Some parents choose the school nearest to their home because that is the most important factor to them, whereas others reject the closest school because they think that its academic reputation is poor or they get a bad impression from the students as they move about in public. They might prefer a different specialism from the one offered by their local school, or they may want a denominational school of the faith to which they adhere. Their children might want to go to the school that their friends will attend, or they might want a school near their after-school child minder. There are countless reasons for parents' choice of school. The important thing is that it should be their choice and not one determined by the affordability of travel. The Bill will force many parents to send their children to their nearest school, whether they choose it or not.

The Education and Skills Committee's report on the draft School Transport Bill states:

> "The Secretary of State for Education and Skills has said that the main aim of the draft School Transport Bill 'is the encouragement of people to go to their local neighbourhood school . . .' The Secretary of State's interpretation of the Bill's objectives seems directly to conflict with Government policies on diversity of schools and parental preference, which increase mobility . . . The draft Bill makes no legal requirement for children from low-income families to receive free transport to any school which is not their nearest school. It is therefore hard to see how the Bill will extend parental choice to low-income families."

The Bill retains the statutory walking distances of 2 miles for primary school children and 3 miles for secondary pupils. Those distances date back to the 19th century and are no longer applicable to 2004 living. The Library explains the term "statutory walking distance" as

> "the shortest route along which a child, accompanied as necessary, may walk with reasonable safety."

That is a familiar term to me because in a previous incarnation I was the chairman of the infamous committee to which the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who is no longer in his place, referred. The names and places that he mentioned were familiar to me.

The committee used to get into a minibus, go round the county and walk the routes from school to home where parents had appealed against refusal of discretionary transport. There were many reasons why on paper it looked as though the child was not entitled to free transport. However, having walked the routes, as the hon. Member for Braintree recounted, we crossed ditches and railway lines. I even recall walking through the yard of a pig farm. There are many reasons for appeals. Having travelled the routes and seen the practical problems in getting children to school, even where the statutory home-to-school distance is not breached, it is clear that there has to be a huge amount of discretion in granting free transport.

I am rather concerned about using free school meals as a measure. I shall refer to the Select Committee report again. It says that it had > "serious reservations about the adequacy of 'free school meals' as a definition for the category of protected children. Many families eligible for free school meals do not claim their entitlement. In these cases, local authorities may have difficulty in ascertaining who is eligible for free transport. Free school meal entitlement is available to those whose family income is below £13,200 per year.

[Angela Watkinson]

Families whose income is just above this level, particularly large families, may be significantly disadvantaged by the new regime and the 'cut-off' income level may cause just as much inequity as the arbitrary limits of walking distances."

I believe that the arrangements for school transport in London authorities are slightly different from those elsewhere in that they have to provide local implementation plans that comply with the transport strategy of the Mayor of London. Do the Government intend to abandon those plans and establish an entirely new regime, or are the Bill's provisions compatible with Transport for London's arrangements?

I spoke to Havering education authority this morning, which I imagine is like many London education authorities in that there is not a great deal of discretionary transport, because there are many schools close to one another and, in general, the distance from home to school is quite short. The only exception might arise where a family with school-age children move into the borough and find that the schools within walking distance of their home have no spare capacity, requiring them to send their children to the next town, although it must be said that that is unusual. In the main, London education authorities provide free school transport for children with special educational needs, and their budget includes only a small discretionary component. They are unlikely to be significantly affected by the Bill, and will certainly be affected far less than rural and semi-rural areas.

Hon. Members will have received lobbying material from the National Autistic Society, the Royal National Institute of the Blind and Mencap, which are concerned about the provision of transport for children with special needs. The Secretary of State assured the House that statemented children and special educational needs children who have not been statemented will still receive free transport, but he did not specify what sort. The Bill, partly by encouraging people to send their children to the nearest school, implies that children should use mainstream public transport. However, such transport is unsuitable for certain categories of special needs children, even if they are not statemented. The organisations that I mentioned would therefore like the Bill to enshrine a promise that transport will be suitable for the individual child's needs. Some children, for example, cannot travel without an escort and cannot cope with large numbers of children on mainstream transport.

In conclusion, the Government's plan to charge children for school transport is another third-term tax rise. Parents who send their children to rural, semi-rural or denominational schools will be particularly disadvantaged by charging schemes, as those journeys are likely to be the longest. All parents, however, especially those with several children of school age, will be concerned about the proposals. The discretionary element of many LEA school transport budgets was squeezed last year following the funding crisis, and it is likely to disappear altogether when the new charging arrangements are introduced. The choice of school will be dominated by the cost of the journey from home to school and, in practice, will mean no choice at all for many parents, who will be forced to send their child to the school for which they can afford the travel, even if they would not otherwise have chosen it. Charging for school transport deprives parents of choice, and the Government should think again.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I had an unavoidable engagement. I wish to participate, however, as the Bill is of particular importance to my constituency, which is the largest in England and Wales. Indeed, the population in Powys is three times as sparse as it is in Cumbria, which many people believe to be one of the most sparsely populated counties.

Members who represent rural areas are obviously the most concerned about the Bill, even though it allows authorities to set up pilots. Many education authorities do not wish to engage in the programme, but the financial pressures on them will be such that they will be strongly encouraged to do so. My own county of Powys, which spends more per head on school transport than any other county in Wales and, I suspect, England, believes that the money that it receives from the Assembly through the standard spending assessment and the calculation of local government grant is not enough to support the school transport system, and it has to use money that it would otherwise spend directly on education.

The Bill is urbancentric, and does not address rural reality, as a number of hon. Members have argued. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) spoke about a village just inside the 3-mile limit. I can speak from my experience as a county councillor before I became a Member of Parliament. In Talgarth, the line went straight through the town, so half the families had to pay for their school transport while the other half got it free. Strangely, as happens in these things, those in the less well-off part of town had to pay, while the better-off got it free.

Mr. Jamieson: It happens now.

Mr. Williams: Yes, but I do not understand how allowing Powys county council to enter into some innovative arrangement will improve the situation. The hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), with whom I have lately had some communication, spoke about innovation, but my authority would like to look for resources rather than innovation. Very often, it is the quality and safety of school transport that is the concern of parents, and the fact that everything goes out for tender. Although certain basic safety standards must be met, many parents are concerned about the way in which children are looked after on the buses and some of the environments in which they travel.

The problem is not decreasing, but increasing. Just last week in my constituency, Trecastle school received final notice of closure. It has about 25 pupils who will have to make a bus journey from Trecastle to Sennybridge, which has the nearest school. As the almost inexorable closure of small rural schools goes ahead, the need for school transport will increase rather than decrease.

I do not think that the subject of further education has been addressed; if it has, it was only in passing. When further education was taken out of local authority control, authorities were left with the most difficult part to organise—transport. In my area, Coleg Powys has four bases in Ystradgynlais, Brecon, Llandrindod and Newtown. Those different parts of the college specialise in different things. Students based in Brecon who want to study engineering, for example, sometimes have to travel to Newtown 50 miles away. Yes, they sometimes get boarding in Brecon, but the 50-mile journey is made there and back every week. What will be the cost to those students? Yes, they get an allowance, and we are very pleased about that, because it encourages pupils to stay on in further education. If the money must all be spent on transport, however, it will not be a huge incentive.

One of the most encouraging aspects of the Bill is that it gives local authorities power to set up their own scheme, but that must be agreed by the Secretary of State in England or the Assembly in Wales. That provision gives power to local authorities on one hand, but takes it back on another. I know that the Minister will say that it is a safeguard.

Jim Knight: Surely it is right to have the safeguard to ensure that what happens is in the public interest and is not a cost-cutting measure. There may be some areas in which such an arrangement is inappropriate, because they are so rural and sparsely populated that it will create an unfair burden on those who live outside the 3-mile area, and that burden will not be countered by the huge benefit for people who live between 2 and 3 miles away from the school, who will get a much better and more safe and satisfactory scheme as a result of the pilots.

Mr. Williams: I agree that the measure will help, and I am sure that people will be able to put in place schemes in urban areas that are better than the current arrangements. It seems, however, that the Government cannot trust local authorities and want to take power to themselves. While the provision may be a safeguard, it certainly does not do much for devolution.

4.59 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): We have had a good-humoured debate on an important subject, which is of significance for millions of hard-working families. Loyal, if somewhat gullible, Labour Back Benchers support the Bill, which is opposed by everyone else—all Opposition Members and millions of people outside this House are now wised up to the siren voices of new Labour.

The biggest problem with the school run is the large number of pupils who live between 1 and 3 miles from the school gate and who travel to school by car, which is a point that the Secretary of State conceded in his press release on 14 October:

> "Twice as many children are driven to school now in comparison with 20 years ago—around 40 per cent. of primary pupils and 20 per cent. of secondary pupils. Most of these journeys are less than 2 miles, meaning decreasing numbers of children walking or cycling with serious health implications in terms of lack of daily exercise and the growing proportion of children who are overweight."

The Secretary of State did not tell us whether he used to cycle to school and what impact, if any, it had on his longer-term health. I used to cycle to school along Bath road. That journey was regarded as safe, but it is now totally unsafe and few people would cycle it today. We must address that problem, which has encouraged so many hon. Members to participate in this debate.

The issue of affordability is to the fore. The Government want families who live more than 3 miles from the school gate to cross-subsidise those who live closer. In an earlier exchange, the Minister said sotto voce that the problem is: who will pay for all the worthy things that could be done to improve the school run for those who live closer to schools? The Government's answer is that people who happen to live more than 3 miles away from a school must pay, because that is the only way in which to get extra resources into the system. A host of speakers have referred to affordability, which was also raised during the consultation process. The summary of consultation responses states:

> "A majority of respondents accepted the principle that affordable fares could be charged, if this secured more comprehensive and higher quality school transport, though there was some debate as to what might be considered affordable".

What is the average cost likely to be? The only information that I can bring to the House is that for pupils in Dorset whose transport is currently provided by the county council, and it excludes those who get special school transport. The average cost to the county council is £570 per pupil per annum. If a family had to pay that cost out of its taxed income for perhaps two or three pupils, it would be unaffordable and unreasonable, yet that idea lies behind the Bill.

The Government will put pressure on those local authorities that opt in to the scheme to force people who live further than 3 miles from the school gate to pay substantial sums towards the cost of school transport, which is neither affordable nor fair. It is interesting that the Minister and the Secretary of State have not denied that £570 per pupil per year is the likely outcome if the Bill gets on to the statute book.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made an excellent speech in which he raised a number of unanswered questions and anomalies, and drew attention to the initiatives that he introduced when he was Secretary of State. Those initiatives did not need to be pushed through the legislative process. The then Department of Transport undertook them, using common sense and discretion.

My right hon. Friend is a great enthusiast, if not a fanatic, about cycling. I share his enthusiasm for encouraging cycle training and wearing cycle helmets. However, under the Government, the amount of money that is spent on road safety training in schools has been cut. That also applies to the amount of cycle training, yet the Government have given themselves a fund that could be used to finance more cycle training and more ordinary road safety training for pupils in our schools. The so-called safety camera partnerships now hold the fund and the Government refuse to allow it to be reinvested in road safety education. That money can be used only for propaganda or putting up more speed cameras. What folly!

My right hon. Friend also identified the conflict between choice and being forced to attend the nearest school. The Government have not tackled that issue properly.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

This morning, I attended an important conference about sustainable transport. The chief executive of Sustrans drew our attention to events at Kesgrave school in Ipswich, where 70 per cent. of the children cycle to school. He said that there are only 11 schools in England where more than 20 per cent. of pupils cycle to school and only 19 where more than 10 per cent. cycle to school. It does not need the Bill, with the extra burden and stealth tax that it imposes on people in rural areas, to encourage more cycling to school. If the Government are genuinely interested in sustainable transport and encouraging more cycling, they should get on with it in any event.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) made an excellent speech, which demonstrated the enormous chasm of understanding between Labour Members, who do not understand rural areas, and those on this side of the House, who know what it is like for people who live in large and disparate communities. He made it clear that a system of charging for services that are currently free would have an enormous impact on the people of Northumberland. It would affect the bus services and result in reduced educational choice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) made an important contribution in which she emphasised her concerns about affordability and highlighted some of the key worries of the Select Committee on Education and Skills. They included the Bill's impact on parental choice.

The hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) reminded me of an incident that happened in the summer. I went to Swanage to participate in a television programme about transport. Ironically, a Labour Member of Parliament who was due to appear on the half-hour programme was unfortunately unable to get there before it concluded because he was held up in a traffic jam. There is a congestion problem on the roads in Dorset and it was interesting that a Government spokesman was unable to reach the destination because of it.

My figures for the total cost of transport for Dorset are higher than those of the hon. Member for South Dorset. He claims that the cost was £8.3 million, but the county council told me that it spent no less than £9.5 million on school transport. That is a significant part of the local education authority budget. However, the hon. Gentleman implied that it would be reasonable to charge people in Dorset who live further than 3 miles from the school gate for the cost of school transport. That is unacceptable to people in Dorset generally and, I am sure, to his constituents.

The solutions that the hon. Gentleman was putting forward, including walking, buses and cycling, could be arrived at without the need for this legislation. Staggered school times could be achieved, as I understand it, through the use of statutory instruments in certain circumstances to change the times of the school day, but the Government could deal with that by giving extra discretion to all local education authorities without the need for the Bill. The hon. Gentleman inevitably had a go at his Conservative county council, but it was a pity that he did not mention that Dorset county council is the worst-funded county council in the country and is therefore not in a position to be able to afford all the fancy expenditure that he was talking about.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) mentioned Northumberland and thought, as I do, that we must embed a statutory right to free school transport in our legislation. He reminded us of the impact on educational choice of charging those between 16 and 19 the cost of getting to school or college when the distances involved are quite large.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) was worried about affordability, the impact of the provisions on rural railways and the stigma of means-testing. He thought, as we do, that the Bill was highly discriminatory against those who live in rural areas.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) referred, in his thoughtful contribution, to the success of yellow buses in his constituency. He was enthusiastic about the innovation, but I challenge him to tell me why the scope for innovation should be limited to 20 pilot authorities doing the Government's bidding. Why not allow a certain amount of deregulation, where that would be sensible, and why not encourage more local authorities to be more innovative within the existing framework?

Mr. Kidney: Does the hon. Gentleman take my point that my local authority wanted to be innovative and to offer the yellow bus service to pupils whose journey to school was less than 2 or 3 miles, but it simply could not afford to do so?

Mr. Chope: This is an issue that the Government could address nationally, without any of the measures in the Bill. The hon. Gentleman wants his local authority to provide that service, but why does he think that it should also have all these other constraints imposed on it, such as applying to take part in a pilot scheme with no certain knowledge that its application would be successful? It would also have various other constraints imposed on it.

The Government's explanation for the Bill is that the 3-mile limit for walking to school should be maintained. I think that they state in the explanatory notes, or perhaps in their response to the Transport Committee, that they are sticking to their guns and doing nothing to discourage people from walking or cycling to school when the distance involved is less than 3 miles. The hon. Gentleman thinks that adopting this Bill will help his local authority but, in the light of the Government's avowed policy on transport to school for those living within 3 miles of the school gates, I doubt that that particular scheme would find favour with the Government.

The Government have been forced to defend themselves against all those who oppose the Bill by using hysterical charges of dishonest opportunism. That is why I was particularly interested in the contribution of the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who said that it was an overstatement to say that this system would be a nightmare, because it would be tightly controlled by the Government. He also said, however, that the Bill was a missed opportunity. He put the whole issue into context by saying that the £200 million that was being spent on home-to-school transport was at stake. The Government seem to think that that money should be taken away from rural authorities and reinvested elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman said that that amount paled into insignificance when compared with the £13 billion that the Government were spending on computers, a large amount of which is perhaps being wasted. To make another comparison, taxpayers in this country are already subsidising to the amount of £88 million tobacco growing in the rest of Europe. The Government have their priorities absolutely wrong.

We are against the Bill because it removes the right to use free school buses if the journey is too long, which has been enjoyed by English and Welsh people for more than 60 years. It means more means-testing, higher costs for hard-pressed parents and, worst of all, it is a new stealth tax on families living in rural areas.

5.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): This has been a wide-ranging and interesting debate. We will reflect on the intimation of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) in his latter comments that schools were wasting money on computers. I am sure that many in the educational world will have taken that to heart and noted it down.

I am delighted to have this opportunity to wind up the debate for the Government, and in doing so demonstrate the joint commitment of the Departments for Transport and for Education and Skills to this important Bill. I also welcome the opportunity to respond to many of the good comments made on both sides of the House about the Bill. I want to put the Bill firmly in the context of our wider work on the safety and sustainability of school transport.

Just over a year ago, the travelling to school project was launched by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Skills and for Transport. It reflected a wide consensus that school transport is a problem in need of urgent solution. As we have heard in the debate, twice as many children are now driven to school compared with 20 years ago. Most of those journeys are less than 2 miles, meaning a falling number of children walking and cycling. As many Members will know, some children, particularly in some urban areas, travel just a few hundred yards to school by car, which has unacceptable effects.

The decline in walking and cycling to school contributes to an overall lack of physical activity by our young people. The health consequences of physical inactivity are well known: moderate activity is known to reduce the risks of heart disease, stroke, obesity, type-2 diabetes, osteoporosis, some cancers and hypertension. While in itself, especially for younger children, the school run may be a small part of their daily activities, it contributes to the culture of car dependency and inactivity, which can be difficult to tackle later in life.

The school run can also be unpopular with local residents, particularly those who live near schools. In some places, it causes localised air quality problems and traffic congestion, and compromises road safety around the school gate. We also know that many parents and pupils would prefer to walk or cycle if they felt that they could do so in safety, and wanted to make sure that it is a realistic option for as many of them as possible. I note that my hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) and for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) also made the good point that at this time of year—the school half-term—far fewer cars are on the road and there is much less congestion.

In our action plan, which we published last September, we set out a comprehensive programme of action to tackle car dependency in relation to the school run, by improving the opportunities for pupils to travel to school on foot, by bike or by bus. Across the board, the action plan recognised that to make progress, we would need to meet three key tests. First, we would need to deliver a more effective partnership between national and local government in the provision of school transport services. Secondly, we would need to increase the scope for innovation in planning and service delivery. And thirdly, we would need to ensure that we can learn from the experience and share it with others.

The Bill that we are discussing today is an important element of our school travel initiative, and is intended to meet each of those three tests. First, the Bill will support much closer joint working between central and local government in the development of approval of pilot school travel schemes. Secondly, the Bill will encourage innovation by removing the Education Act 1996 constraints on local flexibility that have been in place for 60 years. Thirdly, the use of pilots will mean that new ideas can be thoroughly tested and evaluated before they are rolled out more widely.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that school transport safety is an important issue when it comes to encouraging people to use school transport? He is aware, I know, of the Stewart campaign. Is he satisfied that the Bill deals with parents' concern about their children's safety on school buses? Will there be an opportunity to review the three-for-two rule, under which three children under 14 can occupy a seat designed for two?

Mr. Jamieson: The Bill does not specifically address school safety issues, as my hon. Friend will have observed. I know that he has strong views on the three-for-two rule. We have no firm evidence that it creates a danger for children, but because more modern buses are coming into operation it is gradually being phased out. Local education authorities must ensure that seatbelts are fitted for children going on school trips, and their contracts with the transport providers allow them to insist that belts are provided for all children.

I was going to make a third point about the Bill. The use of pilot schemes will enable new ideas to be thoroughly tested and evaluated, as I think my right hon. Friend mentioned in his speech.

The Bill will make the first changes to school transport legislation for over 60 years, enabling a limited number of local education authorities initially to develop innovative solutions to school transport problems. I would expect the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) to welcome a Bill that is all about deregulation: I thought he liked deregulation, but he clearly does not like it today. The Bill also removes some of the current arbitrary and outdated constraints on local authority freedom and flexibility, and increases the scope for innovation and improved service provision.

[Mr. Jamieson]

In his peroration, the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said that the Conservatives were going off to fight the Bill tooth and nail. I noticed that at that point only one Conservative Back Bencher was present; clearly all the others had left the Chamber to join the fight against the Bill. I should add that only one Liberal Democrat Back Bencher was present at the time. After the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) had spoken, the Opposition Whips had to fight tooth and nail themselves to find a Back Bencher who would actually oppose the Bill. They managed it in the end—and I commend the Whip, the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), for persuading himself to do it.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said that vulnerable children might lose out. My right hon. Friend challenged him on the important issue of children who are just below the mileage limits—2 miles for children aged eight and under, and 3 miles for all other children of compulsory school age. Did he intend to do anything to help those children? The issue is important in some urban areas, and very important in many rural areas. At present, children who are just under the limit are given no help, whether they are from well-off or—in some cases—very poor families.

It has been suggested that our proposals constitute a threat to free education, but children who are under those limits—it is impractical for them to walk, and on some dangerous roads it is impractical for them even to cycle—currently do not receive free education, because their parents must pay the cost of transporting them to school, whether by public transport or by car.

The hon. Gentleman asked about protection for children with special educational needs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that children with statements would have that protection. There is currently no protection in law for SEN children who do not have statements, but the Bill allows the 20 per cent. of authorities who do not help such children to give them extra assistance.

The hon. Gentleman says that the number of children walking to school is increasing, and, yes, there was a small increase last year. Our policies are working, I am glad to say, but not as many are walking as used to do so, say, 20 years ago. Such changes are taking place, but we are having an impact. The Bill is just a further way of helping more children to get out of the car and on to the bus, or to walk or cycle.

The hon. Gentleman also went on about LEAs being compelled to participate. There will be no compulsion—they will be free to decide whether they want to be involved.

Mr. Collins: Will the Minister therefore address himself to the issue originally raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) and subsequently by me? Will he accept an amendment in Committee requiring the Treasury not to take into account charging in any allocation of grant to local authorities?

Mr. Jamieson: I thought that that matter was covered admirably by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who gave a categorical assurance. But if the hon. Gentleman wants to table an amendment and test the Bill in Committee, he can do so. The scheme is voluntary for LEAs, and there will be no cuts to their budgets on the basis of their participating in it.

Mr. Collins: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: Not at the moment as I want to complete my remarks on the hon. Gentleman's contribution. He said that there is no cross-party agreement in the House on this Bill. That may be right, but I have to tell him that there is considerable cross-party agreement outside it. He will doubtless have read with great care, as I have, the proceedings of the Select Committees that examined this issue, both of which I appeared before. When Councillor Raymond Wilkinson, from Cambridgeshire—as I understand it, he is a member of the hon. Gentleman's own party—was asked on 12 May whether he would participate in the scheme, he said:

> "Cambridgeshire went through their cabinet system two weeks ago and they said that we would be bidding for one of the pilots."

So although there might be no cross-party consensus in this House, there certainly is in local government. We expect the Liberal Democrats to say one thing here and another on the doorstep, but now the Tories are doing precisely the same.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Roger Casale) made a considered speech that dealt in particular with children with special educational needs, the safety of their transport and concerns about checks made on drivers. According to the current instructions given out by the Department for Education and Skills, all drivers of such vehicles should be properly checked. If his authority is not doing so, he should raise the matter with that Department, and perhaps with mine as well. Ofsted will inspect education authorities fairly regularly in this regard, as it is an issue that it takes into account in such inspections. Indeed, my hon. Friend might want to look at the last inspection to see whether his authority is complying with the regulations.

There is also a problem with taxis, particularly in London. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire introduced a very good Bill on this issue, but a loophole has been found in respect of certain taxi providers. Those providing limited services for education or social services needs, for example, are slipping through the net. The road safety Bill that we hope to introduce in the next Session will, I trust, address some of these issues.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) began by saying that this is a dangerous Bill, but his own councillors out in the country do not agree with him. He ought to tell them that in his opinion we are doing something very dangerous, because they certainly do not seem to agree. Of course, the important point that he did not address is that children who live just under the 2-mile or 3-mile limit currently get no help whatever. The Bill offers the opportunity for such assistance to be provided. Local authorities could also help children to whom there is no statutory obligation to provide assistance. I am thinking of children from faith schools for whom there is a nearer, suitable school. What the hon. Gentleman proposed today provides no particular flexibility whatever. The other group, of course, is children who have special educational needs, but do not have a statement. There is currently no statutory obligation to assist those children, but the Bill provides an opportunity for that to happen.

Dr. Pugh: The Bill provides an opportunity, as the Minister says, but does it provide a statutory obligation?

Mr. Jamieson: It is better than what obtains now, because a local authority will be able to take action to deal with that problem. Currently, some 20 per cent. of authorities do not deal with it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made a good speech, calling on us to be bolder. He spoke with very good sense, as he always does, and he pointed out to the House what was confirmed by the subsequent contributions of Opposition Members—that there were no ideas emerging from the Opposition Benches. My hon. Friend and others made the point that the Bill will provide opportunities for children to do more out-of-school activities and for schools to have a longer school day. Particularly in rural areas where children have to travel longer distances, it provides extra opportunities to assist those beneficial activities.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, described as the Cliff Richard of the Opposition Benches, made a consensual speech that had much good sense in it. He talked about the flexibility of the voluntary approach in the Bill. We welcome his comments. After he spoke, we noticed a dash round to find one or two Conservative Back Benchers who would speak against the Bill. They succeeded in the end.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): We have already had that bit.

Mr. Jamieson: Well, we are having it again for the benefit of the several hon. Members who have joined us.

We have taken a number of steps to encourage walking and cycling. In June, my Department published a walking-cycling action plan, which set out 42 practical actions that can be taken to increase levels of cycling and walking, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will note that that should help to improve the position. He spoke about seat-belts, but I am glad to say that there have been very few crashes involving school buses. When LEAs frame their contracts, they have the ability to build that particular safeguard into them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford also made a considered contribution to the debate. He highlighted issues such as pollution in schools, road safety and congestion, and the Bill provides an opportunity for us to deal with them. He also made the very important point that, under current legislation, 90 per cent. of children get no help whatever with their journey to school. The Bill will also address that problem and it should particularly help children on shorter journeys in rural areas.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) made a good contribution to the debate, raising important issues connected with Wales. The Bill will help with problems surrounding Welsh language schools. Currently, there is no obligation with respect to Welsh language purposes if a suitable and nearer school is available.

We have had a good debate. The hon. Member for Christchurch talked about the loyal and gullible Government Back Benchers who spoke in favour of the Bill. Well, I can tell him that there are many loyal and gullible councillors in his party out in the country who support the Bill. It is a good Bill. It will help to get children out of the car and get them walking, cycling or using the bus. I commend this good Bill to the House.

SCHOOL TRANSPORT BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Orders [28 June 2001 and 6 November 2003],

STANDARDS AND PRIVILEGES

Ordered,

PETITIONS

Tetra Masts (Llanidloes)

6.14 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): My petition comes from the people of Llanidloes in my constituency and relates to their considerable concerns regarding the development of Tetra masts, which are a form of communication system. It has been signed by approximately 800 people.

The petition states:

The Petition of the citizens of the Town and district of Llanidloes

Declares that we are deeply concerned and strongly opposed to the proposal to erect and operate a Tetra Mast on the Maes y Llan Industrial Estate at Llanidloes, Powys because it is our belief that the technology is known to be risky and that proper studies on its safety have not been undertaken.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to halt the roll-out of TETRA.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the table.

Post Offices (Leigh)

6.16 pm

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): This petition of 1,600 people in the Leigh constituency represents the hard work of many people in my constituency who are deeply concerned about the Post Office's plans to close seven post offices in the Leigh area—a former mining area with poor public transport and a legacy of ill health and disability, and people who have trouble accessing a post office.

The petition

Declares that the loss of seven well used local Post Offices is too severe, leaves thousands of people more than a mile from the nearest Post Office and would give elderly and disabled people great difficulty in accessing a service.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to support the campaign to keep open Leigh constituency's post offices by doing all in its power to bring about a review of the Post Office Ltd.'s proposals.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Post Office Closures (Burton)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

6.17 pm

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise my concerns about the extent of proposed post office closures in Burton-upon-Trent. First, I must make it clear that I understand the need for the review of the urban network of post offices. It is important that we ensure that the network's remaining post offices have improved facilities for their customers and are economically viable.

There has been a gradual change in the use of local post offices. Long before the Government decided to move away from pension and benefit order books, many people were choosing to have their payments made directly into their bank accounts. I remember being asked about 20 years ago whether I would like my child benefit to be paid into my bank account. Like many people at that time, I chose to retain my weekly payments through the post office in order to support my local branch. I believe that new parents did not have that option. Many people who have become pensioners in recent years have been used to having their wages paid into the bank, and it has therefore been natural for them to receive their pensions in the same way.

The role of the local post office has changed, and even with the development of new services such as those stemming from agreements with some of the high street banks, many branches are not viable. I have therefore reluctantly accepted that some of the post offices in the urban area of my constituency will have to close, even though I recognise that the closure of any individual branch will adversely affect those who currently use it.

The network reinvention programme is important to ensure that post offices do not just wither on the vine. I welcome the fact that more than £81,000 will be invested where necessary in the remaining branches in my constituency. I am glad that those who own sub-post offices that close under the scheme will be able to claim compensation, which in many cases will help to offset the loss of their initial investment in the branch. However, I believe that in the case of the post office area plan for Burton, Post Office Ltd has gone too far. I believe that the plan proposes the closure of too many branches and has failed to take into account the community role of post offices.

The initial consultation document, dated 18 August this year, announced the proposal to close 11 branches in Burton-upon-Trent. One of those branches had been closed for more than a year. The plan includes the opening of one new branch, which means a net loss of nine branches of those currently open. Incidentally, having studied the consultation document again in preparation for tonight's debate, Post Office Ltd has made an error in calculating the number of branches that would remain under the current proposals. It appears to have lost an urban branch—I calculate that nine, rather than eight, urban post offices would remain under its proposals.

On Tuesday this week, I received a letter from Post Office Ltd advising me that a final decision had been taken to close all but three of the 11 branches. Although I am pleased that Post Office Ltd has listened to the views of local councillors, Postwatch and me regarding the difficulties that local people will face if the three post offices at Anglesey road, Calais road and Melbourne avenue close, I regret that the decision on the other eight should have been made so swiftly and before the stage 1 escalation meeting, which will take place on Friday 5 November. I understand that some sub-post office owners are keen to know whether they can close under the programme, but it may have been wise to delay decisions on post offices that are geographically close to those at which Postwatch opposes closure.

It would have been better to examine the black holes that would remain if all the proposed closures went ahead. That particularly applies in the cases of the Calais road and Anglesey road branches—Melbourne avenue stands on its own. In my submission, I grouped the Calais road, Horninglow road north and Tutbury road branches together, saying that the proposed main receiving branch for those branches' customers at a new post office in the Dean and Smedley pharmacy is too far away. That is particularly true for those who currently use the Calais road branch.

My letter continued:

> "Several of the letters enclosed are from users of the Calais Road branch expressing their concern at the distance that they would have to travel to the receiving branch. I share those concerns. There is also one letter from a customer of the current Horninglow branch setting out the problem that those like herself, with visual impairment, would have in walking to the proposed alternative branch. She mentions the difficulty in crossing roads such as Victoria Crescent. You will note that one of the enclosed letters contains a petition from residents of Curtis Court sheltered accommodation who would be seriously affected by the proposal. I believe that further consideration should be given to retaining or opening a branch to serve the Horninglow area, as well as the proposed new office at the pharmacy, which I understand would be a large branch with the need for five serving positions. It would seem sensible to split this capacity between two post offices."

I am glad that Post Office Ltd will re-examine its proposal to close Calais road sub-post office, but it would have been better to reconsider the needs of the customers of all three branches together. Although the new post office branch in the Dean and Smedley pharmacy is too far away from those branches that I have just mentioned, it offers a central location in place of the sub-post offices currently situated at Derby Turn, Sydney street and Victoria crescent. I know that such a move would inconvenience some of my constituents, but it would offer improved facilities and would undoubtedly help to support and complement another valuable local facility, the local neighbourhood chemist.

The notice of closure letter that I received this week contains several references to the > "new Horninglow in the Dean branch".

First, the correct wording is the new Horninglow branch in the Dean and Smedley pharmacy; secondly, the "Dean" in question is no relation to me.

Turning to the Anglesey road branch and the neighbouring Walker street post office, where closure has now been confirmed, the concern that I expressed in my response to the consultation was that the proposal would close both branches in that area, and I ask for consideration to be given to maintaining one post office in the area served by the Walker street and Anglesey road post offices, even if it is in an alternative retail outlet. The proposal is for the main receiving post office for customers of those branches to be the town's main post office, which replaced the Crown post office some years ago.

The town's main post office is situated in a Safeway store, which I understand is being converted into an Asda store. I have great concerns about the capacity of that post office to cope with additional customers. There always seem to be queues, and I was therefore relieved when Post Office Ltd's head of area told me that the intention was to increase the number of counter positions from five to eight. However, I have been now told that that is not the case and that the intention is for only five to remain. I am greatly disturbed by that, not only because of the additional customers who would be directed there by any closure but because many people who are affected by branch closures throughout the town are more likely to visit a town centre post office while shopping than to make a bus journey to an alternative local branch. It is naïve to assume that people will always go to their main or even secondary receiving branch because it is designated as such.

The final branch that gives me grave concern is the one in Melbourne avenue at Winshill. That sub-post office is situated in an estate of mainly former local authority housing. It is on the fringe of Burton-upon-Trent, and the only receiving branch given is three quarters of a mile away. The area is hilly, with little access to other retail outlets and no access to other financial services. I am pleased that in Stapenhill, which is a similar area, there is no proposal to close either of the two post offices, which are perhaps closer together than those at Winshill. However, that poses the question of why the Melbourne avenue branch should be proposed for closure. Although I understand and sympathise with those who wish to take advantage of the closure programme, the willingness of branch owners to close their post offices cannot take precedence over the need to serve the public.

I want the Minister to consider deprivation in the three areas of Burton-upon-Trent where branch closures are still being examined. The consultation letter states:

> "Calais Road, Derby Turn and Victoria Crescent are located in areas that were previously defined as being in deprived locations, however, under the revised indices based on super-output areas these branches are no longer designated as in deprived locations."

I made the point in my response that the Post Office report on Calais road stated:

> "Calais Road is located in a deprived area of Burton-on-Trent."

The latter statement had not been updated, but it demonstrates that it is unwise to presume that revised ways of measuring deprivation mean that an area can suddenly become less in need of support.

The closure consultation does not recognise that the area that the Melbourne avenue branch serves is classed as being in the top 10 per cent. most deprived under the new super-outlet areas. It is also important to note that the population of Winshill is more than 8,000. Similarly, the Anglesey road sub-post office serves one area, which is classed as being in the top 20 per cent. most deprived, according to the new criteria.

I understand that money has been made available through the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to improve post offices in deprived urban areas of England. I hope that some of that funding can be used to provide services in the areas where Postwatch and I have objected to closure.

We rightly try to protect our rural post offices and I am glad that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry recently announced that up to £300 million will be made available from 2006–08 to extend the financial support package for rural post offices. I have 14 rural post offices and know about the efforts that Post Office Ltd and Postwatch make to maintain the network. Rocester's post office is currently closed, and I know that everything is being done to restore the service to the village as soon as possible. In Uttoxeter, alternative premises were recently found when another rural branch closed because of the change in ownership of the shop.

Just as I believe that we should maintain post offices in rural areas, I believe that we should ensure that urban communities such as those on the Manners estate at Winshill and around the Calais road/Horninglow part of Burton do not suffer through the closure of their local post office.

We should examine the innovative ideas that have been developed in rural areas and use them to tackle the needs of urban dwellers. Why cannot we have part-time post offices in urban areas? Will my hon. Friend the Minister consider developing mobile post offices, which could reach the parts of our inner cities and towns that ordinary post offices cannot reach?

I started my speech by referring to the changes that have taken place in the use of post offices over many years. Despite those changes, many senior citizens want to continue to use their local post office. They have chosen to have a Post Office card account or they draw cash from their bank account at their local branch, and they enjoy meeting their friends on pension day. While that continues, mobile and part-time post offices could provide the service that they need and deserve.

I pay tribute to Postwatch for its efforts on behalf of my constituents, especially Irene Shiels, who has paced the streets of Burton and elsewhere to examine the proposals in detail. I am glad that Postwatch has referred the Melbourne avenue, Anglesey road and Calais road branches to stage 1 escalation, and I hope that Post Office Ltd will listen to the just arguments that have been put forward for the retention of post offices in those areas. I look forward to receiving any help that the Minister can offer.

6.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on securing this debate. As she demonstrated in her speech, she has been assiduous in voicing local concerns on behalf of her constituents about Post Office Ltd's urban reinvention proposals. She spelled out very clearly her views on the impact of the proposed post office closures in her constituency, to which I shall return shortly.

The future of the post office network is relevant to every Member of the House. We all share concerns for the future provision of post office services in our constituencies, and I want to assure my hon. Friend and other hon. Members that the Government are fully committed to maintaining a viable nationwide network of post offices. The starting point for Government policy for the post office network is the performance and innovation unit's report, produced in 2000, on modernising the post office network. The report was widely welcomed for squaring up honestly to the challenges that the network faces, and it made 24 recommendations for the future, all of which the Government accepted.

The PIU report showed quite starkly that our network of post offices had not kept pace with the changing needs of its customers. Too often, post offices had become dingy and shabby through a lack of investment, and were losing business. The Post Office faces an enormous challenge. In recent years, Post Office Ltd has incurred very substantial losses: £163 million before exceptional items in 2001–02; £194 million in 2002–03; and £97 million in 2003–04.

Ninety-seven per cent. of the nation's post offices are run by sub-postmasters—private business people who have invested in their businesses not only their own money but a great amount of care and effort to help the post office network to achieve its highly regarded status. However, with declining profitability in the network as a whole and, in many cases, at individual office level, the ability of sub-postmasters to sell on their businesses—the way in which they have moved on in the past—has taken a severe knock.

Decisive action had to be taken to ensure that we maintain a sustainable countrywide network for the future, and that is the action that the Government are taking. The post office network has been contracting since the 1960s. The previous Conservative Government presided over 3,500 closures between 1979 and 1997, but in all that time they produced no policy on how to structure the network and ensure that it could continue to remain relevant into the 21st century.

There have been reductions in post office usage for all sorts of reasons, and the absence of investment by the previous Conservative Government was an important one, but major advances in technology, greater mobility and changes in shopping and financial habits all mean that a large proportion of our constituents are simply not using the post office as they used to, and custom has reduced sharply. This is not a matter of the Government or some unseen market force acting against the interests of the Post Office and its customers. It is about ordinary people—our constituents—making choices. The decline in transaction volumes is not just about the changes in benefit payment arrangements that started to come into effect last April. The decline started well before then, and applies not just to benefit payments but to a much wider range of services, including Girobank and National Savings transactions, telephone bill payments and postal orders.

This change is not a uniquely British phenomenon. Research commissioned by Postcomm—the regulator for postal services—found that in other countries people are increasingly accessing services electronically, over the telephone and through the internet. In response, most countries have been remodelling their networks, usually by closing the smallest or least profitable offices and converting directly run offices into agency offices. In Germany, for instance, the number of post office branches has been reduced drastically from 30,000 to 13,000. In Britain, other networks, such as those of the retail banks, have been scaled back, too. Like them, the post office network needs to adapt to changes in people's preferences and to new ways of doing business. These external changes pose big challenges to the network of post offices, and they have to be addressed, not ducked.

In my hon. Friend's constituency, I understand that at the start of the urban reinvention programme there were 32 post offices, 18 of which the Post Office classified as urban and 14 as rural. Since September 2003, Post Office Ltd has prepared closure proposals on an area plan basis, using parliamentary constituencies, grouped together where appropriate, to give a clearer "once over the ground" view of future service provision. On 26 August, the area plan for Burton-on-Trent and the neighbouring constituencies of Derby, North, Derby, South and South Derbyshire went out to public consultation. In Burton-on-Trent, 11 closures and one new branch opening were proposed. As my hon. Friend said, particular concern was expressed in relation to the proposals for three sub-post offices. I have noted her views and disappointment that Post Office Ltd's final decision has been to proceed with seven closures and to confirm as permanent the closure of Shobnall road, which has been closed on a temporary basis for more than a year.

I also understand that, in the light of concerns and comments raised by my hon. Friend, her constituents and Postwatch, three proposed closures—Anglesey road, Calais road and Melbourne avenue—have been referred for further consideration under the escalation and review process. I am sure that she will welcome this evidence that the particular concerns raised about the proposed closure of those three offices are to be considered in further depth before final decisions are made. In the remaining cases, Postwatch has accepted that there is not enough business for them to remain viable. I understand that, with one exception, all the offices confirmed for closure have an alternative office within 1 mile and that as a result of the planned new Horninglow office, four will have an alternative within half a mile or less. In addition, significant investment in improvements to the facilities and service of the remaining offices will take place.

As regards disabled access to, and facilities in, post offices, Post Office Ltd is taking action to meet the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. That includes self-assessment packs for all sub-postmasters to help them understand any specific issues at their branch. Disability awareness training is being provided to all staff and support packs including a signature template, magnifier, fat grip pens and clipboards distributed. In some branches, level access, drop-down counters, automatic doors and mobile hearing induction loops are being installed. Several such measures are to be taken at offices in my hon. Friend's constituency.

It has been suggested, although not by my hon. Friend, that the programme is wholly driven by sub-postmasters' wishes. Two years ago, Post Office Ltd surveyed urban sub-postmasters for non-binding indications of interest in leaving the network. Around 3,500 expressed an interest in leaving and those responses helped the Post Office prioritise its proposals in the early stages of the programme. I wholly agree that sub-postmasters' preferences should not be the sole determinant of Post Office Ltd's closure proposals. Indeed, it would lead to many of the problems that we associate with unplanned closures, such as gaps in the network. Post Office Ltd has given assurances that sub-postmaster preference is not the key driver of change when preparing an area plan. Post Office Ltd seeks to achieve a balance between sub-postmasters volunteering to leave the network, those offices that are not viable, and the need for relocations and new openings. Post Office Ltd maintains that reasonable customer access to alternative offices is always the prime consideration in developing its proposals. As a result, some 1,000 of the 3,500 sub-postmasters who expressed interest in leaving the network under the programme will not have their offices entered into the consultation process and will not be allowed to go. More than 500 have already been informed of that as their areas have come up for consideration.

Therefore, it is important to clarify that, from the start of the programme, Postwatch has recognised that action was necessary to ensure the future survival of the network. It accepted that with too many post offices competing for the same customers in many urban areas, it would not be sensible to oppose every office closure where it was clear that customers would have reasonable access to alternative offices.

My hon. Friend has raised concerns about the distance to alternative offices. In common with the rest of the population, many elderly people and those with young families regularly travel a mile or more to access a wide range of services, including post office services. For example, people will travel to the high street or an out-of- town shopping centre to shop. I believe that people do that largely out of choice, and that is part of the challenge faced by the Post Office, which the restructuring of the urban network must address. Changes in post office provision at local level need not therefore increase car usage overall. For some of our most disadvantaged people, the distance to a post office will be academic, for they may be housebound or able to walk only a few yards. Those people's specific needs should be targeted. They should benefit from home helps and community transport initiatives. My hon. Friend asked about mobile post offices and the possibility of flexible arrangements; I am very interested in the points that she raised, and intend to talk to Post Office Ltd about the future for a viable network.

My hon. Friend said a great deal about the need for the post office network to accommodate the needs of our constituents. Among the performance and innovation unit's recommendations was the recommendation that if the Post Office decided that fewer offices were needed in some urban areas, the Government should consider providing funding to compensate sub-postmasters adequately for the loss of their business. Those men and women have worked hard and it is right that they should be treated fairly now, when the current level of business in the post office network can no longer support such a dense urban network.

In November 2002, following parliamentary approval of the funding, Post Office Ltd began its urban network reinvention programme. The network consists of around 16,000 post office branches, split almost evenly between urban and rural communities. That is more than all the banks and building societies in the country put together. Before the programme started, more than 1,000 urban sub-post offices had at least 10 other post offices within a mile. There is no longer enough business to sustain such a dense network in urban areas.

Over-provision has damaged the individual businesses of sub-postmasters. They have been finding it increasingly difficult to earn a reasonable income, and have been simply shutting up shop and leaving of their own accord. Such unmanaged closures are undoubtedly inconvenient to customers. They are also damaging to the company, and perpetuate the perception that the network is in decline.

We need the rationalisation that is under way because without it there will be unmanaged closures, either as a result of individual sub-postmasters deciding to shut or because Post Office Ltd is unable to attract a suitable replacement where an office has closed because the sub-postmaster has left. Without any action, big gaps would begin to open up in the network, and that is precisely what the current programme will be able to avoid.

My hon. Friend talked about the money that the Government have provided for the modernisation and adaptation of post offices that remain, and we shall continue to provide that money. She was very clear about the situation in her constituency, as have many Members in the numerous debates to which I have responded since taking responsibility for Royal Mail and the Post Office. The work of Postwatch, which my hon. Friend commended, is vital. It would be wrong for Government to intervene in every case. The House voted for commercial freedoms for Royal Mail and the Post Office, for the reasons I gave relating to the amount of money that they were losing. It would be wrong for us to interfere in that commercial aspect. Postwatch is there to protect the consumer's interests, supported by the work of Members of Parliament.

Mrs. Dean: Does my hon. Friend accept that innovative measures such as mobile post offices might need Government intervention, or at least a Government approach to and discussion with the Post Office? I thank him for what he said about the possibility of taking that up with the Post Office, but a bit more Government support might be needed. I feel, and I know Postwatch feels, that if mobile post offices are possible in rural areas they should be possible in urban areas.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Clearly, some of what has been done for the rural network may be applicable to the urban network, and we should examine that possibility. But, for the reasons we have given relating to the financial and commercial situation, it would be wrong to impose our will on a commercial interest. We must work with Postwatch and Postcomm to deal with the position in which Royal Mail and the Post Office find themselves, and find solutions that meet the requirements of the marketplace and consumers. The Government will be doing that very soon. I hope to be able to take a view on the many issues that Royal Mail faces, and I shall certainly discuss with it the question of a viable future network that is sufficiently flexible to meet consumers' and constituents' demands. I am sure that the Post Office, because of the support that it receives from the Government, will want to consider our suggestions.

I will look at the issues that my hon. Friend has raised, and I know that she has done as much as she can in raising them in the House. I know, too, that she supports the Government's position in trying to ensure that we have a viable post office network.

Question put and agreed to.

[MR. ROGER GALE in the Chair]

Public Telephones

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to bring the matter of public telephones to the Minister's attention and to give him the chance to reply to a number of points. It is also a pleasure to see so many hon. Members here today; they obviously have the interests of their constituents at heart.

At the end of August, a constituent telephoned me—whether from a phone box I know not—to draw to my attention to the notice in a phone box in Ponfaen, a small village at the top of Honddu valley in the community of Merthyr Cynog in my constituency, indicating that British Telecom wished to close that facility unless objections were made. At the time, I thought it was an ad hoc proposal, but after further investigation it turns out that BT wishes substantially to restructure its payphones business. Indeed, BT proposes the closure of 33,000 of the 77,000 phone boxes throughout the country. By no means would it have been it a one-off closure.

As a result of that telephone call, I wrote to all the community councils in my constituency, telling them that BT might propose closing the public telephones in their areas and that they should participate in the consultation. I indicated that if they wanted to keep their payphones, it was essential that they make representations.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): It is important to make clear that community councils, parish councils and planning authorities have an absolute veto over such closures. The message has to be got across that it is not one of those consultations that just goes into the ether. If the councils have objections and make them, those objections stand.

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend makes a good point; I conveyed that to the community and town councils in my area. However, BT did not make it clear during the consultation.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): The hon. Gentleman may be aware that Ofcom is considering whether to remove that veto. Does he agree that if the veto were removed, it would be to the detriment of all our communities?

Mr. Williams: Yes; I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point. Ofcom is going to look once more at the universal service obligation. This question comes round once every three or four years. Previously, Oftel was responsible, but the report that resulted from that consultation showed that only 17 people replied to it. I urge Ofcom, as Oftel has become, to ensure that consultation on alterations to the universal service obligation is much wider and more proactive. It would be a sad state of affairs if town and community councils, and parish councils in England, lost the ability to object, even if there were substance to their objections.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. As he rightly says, the review of the universal service obligation is critical. Does he not think it extraordinary that BT is pre-empting the review and pushing ahead with the decimation of the payphone network just as the review is taking place?

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for that. It seems untimely that a major restructuring of the payphone business is being suggested at the same time as Ofcom is consulting on the future of the universal service obligation. If it is BT's intention to more than decimate its service, it might have been wise to wait until after the review. Some believe that people's ability to object may be limited.

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I think that Ofcom would find some of the things that have been said surprising. Although it is reviewing the public service obligation, it is not, as I understand it, considering removing the veto by local authorities.

Mr. Williams: I am very pleased to be reassured by the Minister on that point. However, I presume that the fact that the universal service obligation is to be reviewed means that everything is open. Certainly, we will be making representations on the basis that our power of veto will not be removed. In my constituency, some 114 for the 272 payphones are proposed for closure. I am concerned about BT's decision to remove such a substantial number of payphones not only from my constituency in Wales but throughout the country. Those phones can be essential, even life-saving.

Let me give an example; the economy of the Llanwrtyd Wells area in my constituency—which has no mobile phone coverage at all—is dependent on forestry. When a life-threatening accident took place there, it was only because the local people knew the location of a payphone box and were able to get to it quickly that they were able to summon an air ambulance to take the victim to hospital. That saved his life.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, and congratulate him on securing this important debate. It seems that BT has failed to make a specific economic case against any individual kiosk, but it has blamed mobile phones for cutting the business from under its feet. Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the key issues is that mobile phone coverage in rural areas is extremely patchy and that emergency, life-saving phone calls must be allowed to continue? For that reason, the kiosks need to remain.

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point. I am sure that all of us who represent rural areas will vouch for that experience. I do not consider that payphone boxes are the only solution to the problem; I am taking part in a campaign in my constituency to improve the coverage of mobile phones. However, that does not do away with the need for payphone boxes. One could argue that we do not need payphone boxes in town where mobile phone coverage is perfect, but we certainly do. Getting a good communication system depends on bringing together all the available technology.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. Is not the economic argument that is used against many of our rural phone boxes the same as that used for the lack of improvement to mobile phone coverage? Providers are saying that they cannot be bothered to go into rural areas because it does not make them enough money. They must accept that rural areas need to have a service delivered one way or another.

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend shares a constituency boundary with me in the Teme valley, a very remote area. Sometimes, in winter, it is entirely cut off from vehicular traffic. A sound communication system, using all the technologies that are available, is essential for people living in such areas; that is one of the issues that I shall come on to. Everybody expects a good communication system, and without one we will not be able to encourage young people to make their homes in such areas and to work there.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Williams: I will, although I hope to return to the first page of my remarks soon.

Andrew George: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I am sure that we will allow him to make progress. It is not simply a question of offering a choice of a variety of services. In Cornwall, we are about to lose up to 200 of 1,000 payphone boxes. That will have a significant impact. In the remote rural areas in my constituency, including the Isles of Scilly, a lot of those boxes are used by people who have no choice. They do not have mobile phones and they do not have phones at home. Social policy should be the justification for keeping them.

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend is right. He brings his great experience of island dwellers—something that I do not have—to the debate. As he says, public telephone boxes were put under a universal service obligation at the time of privatisation because it was anticipated that not everybody would have a land-line, but thought that everybody should have access to communications. A number of people either do not have land-lines or have land-lines on systems that are not sound, which often break down. Our experience is that it now takes longer than ever to get BT to undertake those repairs.

I want to bring to the Minister's attention the fact that payboxes are used by up to 8,000 children a year to call abuse lines. Those children do not want to use the telephones in their homes because they are concerned that they will be overheard or that their parents, or whoever may be abusing them, could trace those calls. That is another reason why there should be access to public call boxes.

People who live in rural areas believe that they are losing services. It is an incremental process, but the quality of their lives is getting lower. There is no incentive to encourage people to stay in rural areas and find work or create jobs and employment if they do not have a good communications system. Often, people who have made money in other areas come to rural areas and, with the wealth that they have generated elsewhere, access services that are outside the means of local people. To take away payphone boxes would be another example of that problem. As a responsible company that is bound by the universal service imperative, BT has every obligation to ensure that that does not happen when it considers removing its payphones.

I have met and talked extensively with BT and have brought representatives of community councils from my constituency to talk to BT, and representatives of other local authorities. So far, I have no reason to doubt BT's intention to make the consultation exercise a genuine one. BT has made it clear to me that if objections are received through the local planning authority, it will have no alternative but to keep the relevant payphones open. That point has been raised by other Members, but has not been made clear.

I know that there has been a problem in national parks, although I have yet to check with my national park whether—

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

I was fortunate enough to be able to advise local parishes and planning authorities in my part of Somerset of their right of veto, which we heard about earlier, and thereby save 21 boxes. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Exmoor national park authority was not notified of that process by British Telecom because BT did not recognise it as a local planning authority? That is quite amazing. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would have been better if BT had been aware of how its own consultation process works?

Mr. Williams: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising that point, which he raised with me before the debate. I did not check the situation with my national park authority, although I understand that all objections should go through the planning department of Powys county council. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has secured the retention of 21 payphones in his constituency.

I have information that although Members of Parliament were all consulted on this matter, Assembly Members were not individually consulted. Perhaps BT does not recognise the existence of national parks or the Welsh Assembly. I have raised this matter with BT and it has now had meetings with representatives of the National Assembly for Wales; it has rectified the problem, albeit at a late stage in the consultation.

The universal service obligation was imposed on BT in 1984 as a means of ensuring that the monopoly that the company enjoyed at the time of privatisation and the imminent commercial benefits of privatisation were balanced with a number of the responsibilities that BT had held as a state-owned company. One of those responsibilities was to provide a certain amount of payphone coverage throughout the country as an alternative to land-lines.

BT is still by far the largest provider of land-lines in the UK, and it is only right that that monopoly should be accompanied by a certain degree of corporate responsibility. However, the changing nature of the telecoms industry since privatisation and the huge surge in mobile phone usage over the past five years have affected the profitability of payphones and rendered certain aspects of BT's obligation unsustainable.

BT Payphones is a wholly independent subsidiary of the BT group, responsible for its own budgets and revenue flows and, we are told, unable to seek subsidies from other more successful subsidiaries of the business. I am not sure whether that is the case; perhaps the Minister can help us by explaining that in relation to competition policy. BT Payphones are already cross-subsiding some of the loss-making payphones with the more profitable ones. However, the losses are such that BT predicts that if nothing is done to restructure the business, the whole BT payphone network could be at risk. BT has made that claim, and I take it in good faith, but perhaps the Minister could address the issue. Such a situation would not be in anyone's interests, and it is imperative that something be done to redress the balance of responsibilities, should BT's dire warnings prove substantial.

The universal service obligation is reviewed every three to five years, to take account of the changing nature of the market. Within the next month or so, Ofcom will launch its first review. The last was carried out by Oftel, and few people responded to the consultation. Ofcom is likely to take into consideration the distortion to the payphone market created by mobile phone technology. Although it is impossible to pre-empt the outcome of the consultation, it is not unreasonable to expect the rules and regulations to be somewhat relaxed to save the company and its finances.

As the regulations now stand, BT is entitled to remove any payphone where there is another within 100 m. If, as is often the case in rural communities, there is no other payphone within 10 miles, let alone 100 m, BT has to alert the local authorities and consult the public by placing a notice in the payphone. As we know, people have a period of time in which to object, and any objections that go through the local planning authority are a veto on the closure.

In our case, consultation was taken through August. I made representations to BT and the period was extended into September, because even the most active local authorities are sometimes not in a position to carry out the consultation and make representations. The veto achieved by residents and local authorities may be good news in the short term, but it is not a sustainable result in the long term. The local communities in most need of the services, such as those in the very rural areas, stand at the most risk of losing their public call box in the long run.

Objections lodged to local authorities because the payphone provides good shelter during a thunderstorm or lights up the centre of the village are not reasonable grounds for keeping payphones open. They do nothing to substantiate the sound objections of those communities that depend on the facilities.

I am concerned that the massive closures are being considered just before the Ofcom consultation has been covered. If, as a result of this or future consultations, rules and regulations surrounding the universal service obligations are relaxed—that is likely to be the case—local communities could stand to lose the payphones that they so badly need.

BT can do more to have dialogues with local authorities, not only at the time of proposed closures, but in the interregnum periods, to find out ways in which such services can be maintained. Local authorities are already looking for ways in which they can keep post offices open, but payphone facilities should also be included. Many local residents groups and community councils in Wales already take it upon themselves to clean and maintain local payphones and it is likely that many local authorities would welcome the opportunity of added responsibilities if they valued the presence of payphones themselves. That would obviously be something that local authorities would have to take into consideration and they would also have to understand the costs involved. It is not for us to indicate what responsibilities local authorities might wish to take on, but this is an opportunity for us to ensure that local authorities have the necessary powers.

Andrew George: What my hon. Friend has not explained so far is that local authorities cannot, at this stage, argue with BT with regard to its policy and the reason why that policy undermines the viability of the boxes themselves. The minimum charge is 30p and often people without any change have a lot of coinage swallowed up. It is an expensive option and a lot of people lose a lot of money trying to use phone boxes, as I discovered recently on St. Agnes on the Isles of Scilly. Local authorities cannot properly engage with BT's policy and the expensive nature of the service.

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. It reinforces the point that I am making to the Minister, which is that BT should be in consultation with local authorities and the Local Government Association on these matters. My information is that BT has not consulted as fully as it could with local authorities or local authority associations. The process would be of benefit to BT and would indicate how local authorities see the opportunities for making the service more substantial and more sustainable.

As I understand it, the working partnerships or subsidies by local authorities are currently illegal under privatisation legislation. It is essential that the Government look again at legislation surrounding competition law to allow those sustainable partnerships to take place. A partnership could take many forms and it is not up to me today to indicate what form it would take. That is best determined at local level. For instance, local authorities could explore the option of paying BT a fixed rental to cover the cost of the network. BT could enter into any number of arrangements with local authorities.

[Mr. Williams]

My reservation, as far as BT Payphones is concerned, is not that BT is being unreasonable in wanting to restructure its business, run a successful company and be responsible to its shareholders in a loss-making market. My grievances are that, as a business that prides itself on innovation, BT has been particularly lacking in innovation when it comes to finding solutions to this problem. It embarked on a programme of draconian action, decreeing that it was going to cut the payphone network by almost half in terms of the existing coverage, without exploring any options on a more local level to show its willingness to sustain this vital service and honour its duty under the universal service obligation.

BT has made little or no attempt to contact local government associations, which are ideally placed to identify which options would be most keenly supported by certain authorities. Nor did it make any effort, for the purpose of finding a workable solution, to contact district and borough councils, which dispose of the kind of funding that would realistically be needed to undertake such partnerships. Such a partnership would tie in particularly well with the functions of local authorities in promoting tourism in their area. In future, BT should therefore be urged to explore such options with local authorities and appropriate bodies before it makes planned closures.

My purpose today is to ensure that rural areas have viable communication systems. As in towns, some of that system will be provided by public call boxes, some by mobile phones and some by land-lines. The elimination of public call boxes will lead to social exclusion, danger to residents and visitors alike, and to large swathes of the countryside becoming less attractive places for young people to work and set up home. Certainty about the continuation of land-line provision would be beneficial, because if payphones are being undermined by changes in the universal service obligation, a number of us are concerned about the long-term effect of that on the provision of land-lines to very remote rural areas. Being certain about land-line provision, and an improvement in mobile phone coverage, would contribute to the provision of a satisfactory communication system.

I hope that the Government will use their influence to encourage mobile phone operators to extend their coverage and work with local authorities—especially in national parks—to identify safe and satisfactory sites for relay masts. Even with all the profitable avenues explored, the market will eventually fail to maintain phone boxes that are vital to vulnerable communities.

The universal service obligation is currently being carried by BT Payphones cross-subsidising their socially important boxes from those situated in more densely populated areas. At the moment it is illegal for local authorities to support that infrastructure because at the time of privatisation it was seen as unfair to any competition. That point no longer stands; no new public call boxes are springing up in rural areas.

The problem is to maintain the really important phone boxes as part of an overall system that includes land-lines and mobiles. The way forward is to encourage private and public partnerships, in which the private sector provides technology and the public sector integrates services such as cash collection by means of existing employees. In order to allow this vital public service to continue to serve the community, I call on the Government to use their powers to allow such partnerships to flourish.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I intend, as is customary, to call for the winding-up speeches at 10.30. Six hon. Members have indicated that they wish to speak, and hon. Members can do their own sums. If each Member speaks for roughly five minutes, everyone who wishes to speak will be called.

9.56 am

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): I thank the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) for initiating this important debate. I was first alerted to the fact that BT was engaged in a major national cull of public payphone boxes by the good people of Edenbridge in my constituency, where the town positively erupted on BT's disclosure that it was going to try to remove approximately one third—four out of 13—of the payphones from that town. I took up the issue with the chief executive of BT and he gave me an extremely interesting—and what I found to be an extraordinary—reply:

> "If the local community and council still feel that the retention of the payphones is an issue, we could offer to keep them where they are, however we would need some contribution from a third party."

Mr. Ben Verwaayan, in this letter to me of 12 July, made no reference whatever to the supposed veto in the consultation. He was advancing a policy on behalf of BT that amounted to "Pay up or lose it".

Mr. Verwaayan went on to quote BT's prices, call box by call box, for allowing us to keep our payphones in Edenbridge. The cheapest was £311 a year and the most expensive was £1,284 a year. Quite how Mr. Verwaayan made his calculations was never revealed, but I have to say that I found that an extraordinary policy from a company that is supposedly under a public service obligation.

The pay-up-or-lose-it policy did not appear to endure long within BT because a matter of hours before I was due to appear on national television to discuss the issue, the director of BT Payphones, Mr. Paul Hendron, came pounding round to see me in the House of Commons and offered me a completely different proposition. As the two local authorities concerned—Sevenoaks district council and Edenbridge town council—had objected, he proposed that he would not override their objections and said that the payphones could remain. I asked him to repeat that assurance. He did. I asked him to repeat it again. He did, and I hold BT to the triple assurance that I have been given.

It may interest hon. Members to learn that Mr. Hendron proved to be very informative about the situation in my constituency. I did not know how many payphones BT had. He told me that there were 120 in my constituency. I certainly did not know how many, in BT's view, were making losses. He told me that 44 payphones—about one third—were. He then gave me an interesting computer-printed, payphone-by-payphone schedule of those 44, which BT had divided into two categories. One category was headed "Social" and included 29 payphones, all of which were making losses. BT said that it would keep them for the time being. The other category was headed "Removals" and listed the other 15 of the 44 loss-making payphones, all of which BT was trying to remove. It was illuminating information, and I have sent it to all the local authorities.

The problem that I, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire and other hon. Members face in our constituencies reflects the national policy issue, which is whether there should continue to be a national system of public payphones. Ultimately, it is a matter not for Ofcom but for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I put this central issue to the Secretary of State on 12 August, when I asked:

> "please could you tell me whether or not it is the Government's policy that there should continue to be a comprehensive network of public payphones available in Britain. If so, please tell me what action the Government will take to ensure this."

The response I received from the Secretary of State was totally inadequate. On 27 August, she replied that she was sorry to hear of my concerns and that the matters raised were the responsibility of the Office of Communications, Ofcom, as the independent regulator acting under the terms of the Office of Communications Act 2002 and the Communications Act 2003. That was a total abdication of responsibility. It is time that the Government came clean about whether their policy is that there should continue to be a national system of public payphones. I expect the Minister in response to this debate to come clean on that fundamental point of Government policy.

10.2 am

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on securing this important debate.

Despite the fall in usage, largely due to mobile phones, payphones are still widely used. In many rural areas such as my constituency, mobile phone reception is patchy and access to a payphone in an emergency is still important. I emphasise the point made by my hon. Friend that children who need to make a call without their parents knowing often use a payphone. ChildLine notes that many of the calls that it receives from the victims of child abuse are made from payphones. Payphones are still important, and as with many emergency services, we appreciate payphones only when we need them.

BT wants to remove 52 payphones from my constituency, and the Kintyre peninsula seems to have been singled out for particular attention. If BT gets its way, there will be no payphone on the A83 down the west side of the peninsula between the village of Muasdale and the town of Campbeltown, a distance of 15 miles. Glenbarr, Bellochantuy, Tangy and Kilkenzie will all be left without a payphone. On the east side of the peninsula, if BT gets its way, there will be no payphone on the 11-mile stretch of road between Peninver and Carradale. The villages of Saddell and Torrisdale are to lose their payphones, and that will leave drivers who break down with a long walk, as mobile phone reception in that area is poor.

BT makes the points that payphone usage has declined and that the payphones on its hitlist are making losses. It is important to note, however, that BT has a universal service obligation and that its shareholders knew this when they bought shares in the company. They went into it with their eyes open.

The veto held by local planning authorities and community and parish councils is important. I was pleased to hear the Minister's intervention, and I hope that in his winding-up speech he will provide an absolute assurance that the veto will remain when Ofcom reviews the communications industry later this year.

I note from BT's correspondence that it claims that the Competition Act 1998 means that its payphone business as a whole must break even so that users of busy payphones subsidise users of little-used ones. However, Ofcom's direction designates BT as the universal service provider, not BT Payphones, which makes BT's insistence that BT Payphones cannot be subsidised from the rest of the BT business a little dubious. Ofcom should investigate BT's claim during the review, and I hope that the outcome will be that BT can subsidise its payphone business from the rest of its business.

It is vital that a council's right of veto remains. By the process that Ofcom has put in place for objections to the removal of payphones, notices are posted on payphones giving a 42-day notice period for users to send an objection to the local council. However, the same 42-day notice period also applies for the council to submit an objection to BT. That clearly gives the council no time to consider objections that the public make. We need two notice periods; the first in which users can object to the council, followed by a further period in which the council can consider those objections and put in a submission to BT.

In my area, BT seems to have found difficulties identifying which community councils have been affected. Ofcom's order allows BT to ask the local planning authority to forward the notice to the community council, but there is an important question; when does the 42-day period start? In my area, BT voluntarily extended the consultation period, but it should be made clear in the rules that the period should start when the community council actually receives the notice from BT.

The right of community and parish councils to veto the removal of the last payphone is a vital safeguard, otherwise large swathes of rural Britain will be left without a payphone, with dire consequences in an emergency.

10.7 am

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on his good fortune in the ballot, which secured this debate. In my constituency, there are more than 100 villages outside Salisbury, and 181 payphones. I was notified by British Telecom on 21 June that it planned to remove 23 telephones, that it would maintain 124 profitable ones and that it was prepared to keep 34 loss-making ones.

So far, the debate has been rather unfair to BT, and I shall say why I think that that is the case before suggesting what the challenge really is. The consultation undertaken by BT as a universal service provider was exemplary, and there is no question but that it fulfilled its obligation to ensure that all the local planning authorities and parish councils were aware of what was proposed. However, the statistics are revealing, and when I went through the figures with which BT provided me, I realised that there was a problem. Among the telephones that BT proposed to remove, several were in areas where one could not get the alternative mobile service. That is the real problem. I wrote to the head of public and parliamentary affairs on 1 July, but when I received a response 11 weeks later my question on that particular conundrum was not answered.

It is fair enough to point out that the public service obligation should be met more widely than by BT alone. Of course it is true that when it took up the challenge and was privatised, BT was all that there was. Now there is a complete change in communications, and the mobile industry is coming forward. For obvious commercial reasons, the mobile industry does not want to have a public service obligation, and who can blame it? But that means that someone must decide whether we really want to have available a universal service of some sort. That all comes down to who will pay the subsidy; that is the bottom line. It is not entirely fair to blame BT for that.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point, but does there have to be a subsidy? Someone travelling outside the UK can access any service provider on their roaming service, but in the UK we have the frustration of being told that there is a signal but we are not allowed to access it because of an exclusive contract. Should not Ofcom review that?

Mr. Key: Of course it should. It is important that it does. That is an option, but who should actually pay? It is all very well saying, as BT does, that there are all sorts of other things, such as advertising. Frankly, that is not a realistic proposition. On any day, only three people and 65 cows will walk past an advertisement on a phone box in Alvediston.

Local people might subsidise the service through the council tax, but the maintenance costs are substantial. BT gave me the service costs of the boxes, and I was surprised at the expense involved. The average cost of maintaining a payphone is £1,650 a year. That is a substantial sum if one has only a few pence a day. I am sure that the situation is not quite as bad as in the old days of pressing buttons A and B and a large copper penny going in—clunk—but it is an expensive proposition.

Perhaps the Government should subsidise payphones as a public service. They will ask why they should. Perhaps there should be premium rates, but why should people in rural areas have to pay two or three times as much per call, particularly at a time when BT has been reducing the actual call cost, extending the time available—its preferred policy—or advertising? This is a real problem, and the Government have an opportunity to encourage Ofcom to think more radically than it has.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate. I do not want to hog the floor, as many other people wish to speak. My main point is that we should not just blame BT. The problem exists because of technological change, and Ofcom must come up with some imaginative proposals for the Government to review and come to a conclusion on. That is the right way forward if we are to ensure that there is universal provision. It is a great irony, at a time when international as well as national communications have never been more available to people, that there is a real problem of who will pay for the parts of the United Kingdom that have a sparse population and are, therefore, an unattractive commercial proposition.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I very much welcome this debate and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on securing it. It has highlighted an important issue. Like him, I expect many phone box closures in my constituency. BT has proposed closing more than one third of them—39 phone boxes. On one 25-mile stretch of road from Alford to the Lecht, it wants to reduce the number of phone boxes from eight to one. I wonder whether it has taken into account in its modelling the knock-on effect of closing the one next door, or does it look at each one in isolation in the current network? That is an important aspect that it needs carefully to consider.

As I said in an intervention, it is important to get across the message in respect of the veto that community councils and planning authorities have. Many constituents meet me in the street and tell me that they object to a phone box going, or to BT reneging on and changing its mind about what they thought was an implicit promise at privatisation that the network would be maintained, but they ask, "What is the point of writing?" The point is that if they write to their community council and if the community council represents their views, the phone box will not close. As it is a rare consultation in which it is still the case that objections are absolute if they come through the right means, this debate is very important in highlighting to people that that veto exists. In Scotland, particularly, the fact that the deadline has been extended to 22 October gives people the chance to get their objections in now that the cycle of meetings is back on.

The fundamental part of this debate is the conundrum that although in a sparsely populated area a phone box will be more difficult to maintain and there will be fewer users, it is in the sparsely populated area that a phone box is more of a lifeline. The fact that it is not economic does not reduce its lifeline potential. As has been said, it is important to take into account the lack of mobile phone coverage and the fact that many people use pay-as-you-go mobile phones. In an emergency, if they have run out of pay-as-you-go, there is the phone box.

The stretch of road that I mentioned leads to a ski resort. In bad weather in the winter, it is important to have a safety net.

Matthew Green: An important point about safety is that the Ordnance Survey maps used by hill walkers show where payphones are. Most people will use the same maps over the next five to 10 years—they do not buy maps that frequently—and if a lot of phone boxes are removed, they may well go down a hillside to what they believe is the nearest box and discover that there are none there. That could lead to people losing their lives.

Sir Robert Smith: That is an extremely important point. To be fair, I think that BT contacted Members in Scotland during the consultation to let us know, but the local authorities feel aggrieved at how they were approached. They were not approached formally, through the chief executive, and had to spend ages trying to decipher and make usable the maps with which they were provided. Although Ordnance Survey maps might have payphones marked on them, my local authority felt that the BT maps were not up to scratch.

One of the questions addressed in the question and answer sheet that was provided to community councils was:

> "Will you be maintaining payphones where there is poor mobile coverage?"

BT's response was:

> "Whilst we are currently working with mobile operators to improve their coverage, we cannot be held responsible for their blackspot areas."

However, BT can be held responsible for finding out where those areas are and, from that, identifying which phone boxes provide a vital function in filling that blackspot. That is an important part of the feedback loop.

I finish by reinforcing the point that the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) made about going forward with the USO and hearing the Government's plan to protect such a vital network. In the case of post offices, the Government have had to intervene to protect rural areas. There is a concern that rural areas are being neglected. Almost by definition, the USO exists because people are not confident that the market will provide the service. On the whole the USO will have to be paid for and it is important that we should pin that down. I am slightly concerned that we are using the average cost of a phone box. Presumably the marginal cost is crucial, because there will be overheads whether or not there are a lot of phone boxes in urban areas. In the consultation by Ofcom, it is important that we remember the implicit promise both that universal services would still be protected when markets were brought to bear and that rural areas in particular would be protected from the damage of competition.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Briefly, does my hon. Friend agree that the industry, rather than the taxpayer, should bear the costs?

Sir Robert Smith: That is a question that is still to be considered. In the end, the costs have to be paid. In some universal services the taxpayer picks up the cost, but in other cases, such as energy, the user gets the universal service through cross-subsidy. There is probably a serious debate to be had on whether the cross-subsidising unit is too small. Is it wrong that the phone boxes are cross-subsidising? Since the industry was privatised and there was meant to be a burden on one player, perhaps all the players operating in the market could be levied to ensure that the universal service is maintained, as in the potential legislation on the postal service. However, it is extremely important to establish in the consultation that rural areas deserve to be connected to the rest of the United Kingdom and that the universal service must be protected.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on bringing forward this important debate. It is particularly relevant to my constituency, which is one of the most sparsely populated in England, and to the north-east of England as a whole, where some 700 phone boxes are threatened by BT. However, I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said: we are not here to attack BT all the time. BT inherited a legacy, but technological change has made that legacy hard to maintain. It is right that we should address our comments not only to the Minister—there has to be Government direction—but to Ofcom, because it is up to Ofcom to come up with a proper solution.

The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) talked about the significance of public call boxes in rural areas. Like him, I am concerned that the boxes that are being targeted in my constituency are situated where there is no mobile phone coverage at all. It is utterly wrong that all forms of telecommunication should be removed from those areas.

Part of the solution lies with mobile phone coverage. Parts of some substantial communities in my constituency still have no mobile phone coverage because the mobile phone companies argue that there is not enough revenue from them. The companies generally do not want the expense of putting up masts, although some do, and that is the irritating thing. For instance, when the disastrous foot and mouth epidemic hit my constituency—particularly in the part of it in which mobile phone and, indeed, television coverage is very poor—I noticed that some vets and Ministry officials had three mobile phones, because if they could not get reception on O2, they might get it on Orange and if they could not get it on Orange, they might get it on Vodafone. It seems to me that one of the keys to solving that problem is giving our mobile phones the ability to roam as they do abroad. That would extend the coverage of mobile phones hugely.

The Minister has a responsibility to crack the problem. The veto that community councils have about the removal of phone boxes, while existing, will in reality become complete nonsense. It will not be possible for a community council to say no to the removal of a hugely loss-making service. It defies belief that a community council will be able to maintain that power. So we need new solutions and the matter requires the intervention of the Minister. It requires Ofcom to come up with some imaginative solutions about the future.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on making what was undoubtedly the best speech about public telephones that I have ever heard in this Chamber.

I will talk specifically about my constituency, because my hon. Friend made the points about Wales as a whole. Montgomeryshire stands to lose 91 of its 210 payphones—more than one third of the network. I acknowledge that BT faces great financial pressures with regard to those payphones and that the advance of mobile phone technology has had a negative impact on public payphone usage. However, to use that as a justification for eliminating public payphone provision in parts of Montgomeryshire would be like the Royal Mail cutting some of its rural postal deliveries on the basis that many people use e-mail and so do not need a postal service anymore.

Therefore, I ask that BT be sensitive to the peculiarities of our, and other, rural regions. Under current plans, Powys and Montgomeryshire will lose more phone boxes than any other region in Wales. As much of Montgomeryshire is not covered by mobile phone networks, it seems clear that those regions have a particular need to maintain phone boxes.

As we heard, public payphones are a vital means of contact in cases of emergency. In fact, when I had what nearly amounted to a fatal accident in 1998, it was in an area with no mobile phone reception, so it was a close call. Had the accident been any worse, my chances of survival would have been so marginal that a payphone could have made the difference between life and death. Therefore, I speak from experience.

On some routes in Powys, it is possible to travel for 20 miles without a usable phone signal. The removal of public payphones will create communication black holes in Montgomeryshire that are beyond the range of mobile phones. In my judgment, and from my experience, that will inevitably lead to some loss of life—though not in large numbers—and definite suffering in emergency situations. I do not think that those blind spots are acceptable.

The good news is that British Telecom does not find those blind spots acceptable either. It commented recently that:

"the Provision of Service guidelines indicate that we provide public telephone service to any member of a community who does not have access to a landline or mobile telephone".

In that respect, much of Montgomeryshire—indeed, much of mid-Wales—must qualify. I hope that BT will take that into consideration.

In fact, there is a case for increasing the number of phone boxes, not reducing it. I will be satisfied if BT maintains the number of call boxes in areas where mobile phone coverage is poor or non-existent. Naturally, BT will cite economic reasons for the reduction. I was interested in what my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) said about whether it is the payphone part of the company, or BT as a whole, that needs to break even. We have been told that it is the payphone side. Will the Minister clarify which is the case?

I have received many letters of protest about BT's plans from councils such as Penybontfawr community council, Machynlleth town council and Cadfarch community council. Particular representations have been made about the removal of the phone kiosk facility in Hirnant. It is a small community set in a deep narrow valley and there is no hope of getting mobile phone coverage in that area. If the BT payphone is removed, there will be no access to a payphone for a minimum of two and a half miles in any direction. Llanfihangel residents consider their phone box a lifeline, again, because there is no mobile phone coverage. Those examples are typical throughout my constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire highlighted the importance of payphones for child protection. Even when there are mobile phone signals, one must accept that the payphone is sometimes a lifeline between children in need and those who can help them.

Ultimately, the problem is that a private company is charged with providing what is, in essence, a public service. Our task is to reconcile BT's financial needs with the provision of adequate communications coverage for the people of Montgomeryshire. However, I thank BT for attending a useful meeting with my hon. Friend and me on 15 October, in which we were reassured that reasonable objections to payphone closures will be taken seriously and will trigger reconsideration. We were also told that BT will not remove any payphone without the agreement of the local council. We hope that BT will stick to its word.

I seek from the Government progressive debate with all the stakeholders. BT has a long-established reputation in Montgomeryshire, and the local community is generally supportive of the firm's activities in mid-Wales. So far, BT has been responsive to our questions and points, for which I thank it again. If it interacts closely with local communities in my constituency, as it has said it would, I am sure that the issue can be resolved happily. All I ask is that the Minister assures us that, if there is an impasse, or if I and other right hon. and hon. Members have serious concerns, he will be willing to hold discussions that seek to resolve those issues in the interests of the local community.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams.) The number and range of speeches have shown that this is a very live issue that is causing much concern, although, to be honest, I am somewhat surprised by the lack of participation of Labour Members, apart from the Minister. I cannot believe that not one of the 400-odd Labour Members is concerned about their phone box closures. For those who have expressed concern, there are several key issues.

In my case, BT and the local manager informed me before the notices went out that the consultation was about to begin. To be fair, whatever the criticisms about what is proposed, BT has gone through the process fairly well, although I do not believe that it widely advertised the right of veto, which would have seriously undermined its objectives and is a right that people should be aware of. In some cases, there probably will be no objection. One constituent phoned me to say, "Thank God they are finally closing that phone box. It is continually being vandalised and is a target for all sorts of other problems." Some closures will therefore be acceptable, but others will cause considerable concern.

Some of BT's arguments are a little disturbing. The first and most obvious argument relates to the development of mobile phones and the implication that, as most people have a mobile phone, it is reasonable to review the provision of public phone boxes. As has been said, the irony is that BT is removing most of the boxes from rural areas where mobile phone coverage is weakest, which destroys the validity of that argument.

I do not believe that roaming resolves the issue, but it is a central point in any case. The protection of the exclusive contract has run its course, whatever the original justification for it. I understand that Ofcom is reviewing it. Given that most people have used roaming outside the United Kingdom, they will become more and more irritated by their inability to access roaming in the UK. Ofcom should address that issue. I would be interested to know if the Government have a particular view on the issue, which is important.

Another issue is that of emergency calls. BT says that only 7 per cent. of 999 calls come from phone boxes. I do not know how many 999 calls there are, but I suspect that 7 per cent. of a large number is still a large number. It could also be a matter of life and death. Are we saying that, for commercial reasons, 7 per cent. of the population can die in an emergency? That cannot be acceptable.

Something that falls short of a 999 emergency, such as a car breakdown or a missed rendezvous, is a personal emergency. It is an embarrassment, or a cause of confusion. People will worry and the person concerned will want to make contact. One would not dial 999 to say, "Can you tell my mother I've missed the bus?" It is not a 999 issue, but it is important for a mother waiting for a 14-year-old girl. That is when call boxes are really useful.

British Telecom acknowledges that the biggest users of public payphones are in the 14 to 24 age group—the most vulnerable people. Those telephones are also used by callers to ChildLine, for all kinds of reasons, in urban as well as in rural areas. Of course, it cannot be argued that every phone box must be protected just in case a child is about to be abused in the neighbourhood. However, removal seems a matter of real concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) made an important point about Ordnance Survey maps. The marking of important services on those maps is part of a long and hallowed tradition. That is not to argue that, because something is on an Ordnance Survey map, it must never be removed, but, particularly in rural areas where people are walking, hiking or travelling in other ways, the comprehensive withdrawal of the services in question, as opposed to the occasional withdrawal and the warning that goes with it, destroys the value of such maps.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If one starts from the premise that what is needed is a publicly accessible emergency communication system across rural areas—setting aside the commercial considerations—one will start with a map not entirely dissimilar from the present one. If we take a social view of the importance of local phone boxes, we start from the right premise. If we take a commercial view, we start from the wrong premise.

Malcolm Bruce: That is a fair intervention, provided that we add the rider that we mean not only 999 emergencies, but the others that I have identified. My understanding is that BT has said that it could replace call boxes with emergency telephone provision for 999 services. That would be preferable to nothing at all, and would meet the needs of walkers in emergencies, but would not meet the less-than-emergency but still urgent need for call boxes.

The question is: who pays? BT has said that provision should be contained within its call box structure. I understand that there is no legal requirement for that. If the Minister has a view, it will be helpful to know. There is an argument that the industry, including providers besides BT, should be involved, not least because companies whose ambitious, grandiose plans for providing public call boxes all over the country were never fulfilled have left BT as the overwhelmingly major provider. Outside Hull, 1,400 boxes out of 140,000 are provided by someone other than BT.

BT is at present thinking about removing 10,000 of its 138,000 call boxes. As far as I can see, the cuts are pretty evenly distributed. I was interested that every constituency example was remarkably similar. From a Scottish Parliament briefing that I received, I find that, if BT has its way, 10,000 will be removed across Britain. Funnily enough, 1,000 will be removed from Scotland. It so happens that we have 10 per cent. of the population. However, we have 40 per cent. of the land area. The question arises whether the criterion should be where the phone boxes are or where the people are.

There is something not quite right about the approach that is being used. It does not ring true as a genuine call box by call box review. It looks more like an approach based on the need to get rid of 10 per cent. and on finding out where the loss-makers are. The approach to the issue cannot be about profitability. BT has acknowledged that by announcing how many unprofitable boxes it proposes to keep. This is a matter of accessibility.

It may be that some remote call boxes are used only rarely, but that the circumstances of their use make them a vital lifeline. I know of many instances, although this is no comfort to BT, of people using phone boxes in a way that does not generate revenue. It is standard practice in rural parts of my constituency for a child who gets off a bus at the end of the road a mile or two from the farm to phone, let the phone ring three times and hang up. That means, "Mum, I'm waiting for you to pick me up at the phone box." That is an important service. It is not profitable to BT but its withdrawal would cause problems.

Lembit Öpik: I still do that now.

Malcolm Bruce: Frankly, that does not surprise me. One of my constituents even conducted an entire Open university distance learning course from his local phone box. He has now managed to secure that box as a piece of personal heritage from BT, which has been very co-operative.

The spirit in which the debate has been conducted demonstrates genuine concerns and issues. It acknowledges that BT is not being completely philistine and hard-headed about the matter, but recognises that we are not where we should be. The general appeal that I make is for BT to back off just now, to recognise that this is a serious issue, to ask Ofcom to think a little more about the universal service obligation, to deal with the roaming issue—although that does not resolve the matter—and to return to the scheme when people feel that there is cause for rationalisation. My hon. Friends the Members for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) and for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) described specific problems in their areas. Logic tells us that there might be a case for moving every third box if it has very low use, but there is no logic in leaving 11 or 15 miles of road with no box at all.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine and I share one such area. The most celebrated phone box in Aberdeenshire at the moment, for reasons of local campaigning, is at the Kildrummy inn. That used to be in Gordon, is currently in West Aberdeenshire and, thanks to the boundary commission, is returning to Gordon. That makes it a very fought-over and fought-for phone box. The serious point is that it is on the road that leads up to the ski resort. There are boxes every two or three miles, but the proposal is to remove most of them. Logic dictates that there might be a compromise, by which one or two would be removed and two or three kept.

We urge BT to back off and to recognise that the concerns expressed today are serious and genuine. We understand its problem, and there is no lack of constructive engagement with that, but there is a need for a solution that genuinely meets the concerns and needs of rural communities and is fair.

On the point about the real cost, my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) raised a number of points in his representations, and particularly picked up on the point about the £1,400 or £1,500 cost. He said that he did not believe that many of the boxes proposed for closure in his area cost anything like that, and that he did not see why he should have to pay the cost of frequently vandalised boxes in urban areas, which is spread across the piece, when the boxes in his area do not cost a great deal to maintain.

This has been a good and important debate. I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that he cannot hide entirely behind Ofcom on this. We recognise the regulator's role, but views have been expressed constructively and vehemently by too many Opposition Members here. We should like to know not only Ofcom's view but the Government's view on how to deal with the problem.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): This has been an interesting and important debate. As has been pointed out, it is surprising that apart from the Minister, of the 460 or 470 Labour MPs in Parliament not one has chosen to take part in this debate, which affects not only rural but urban areas. In Lichfield, if one has a Vodafone phone, one does not get Vodafone coverage. I hope that Vodafone might be listening, and will provide such coverage. As the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said—I absolutely agree with him—if roaming were possible in the United Kingdom, that would not be an issue because I could access other mobile phone operators through my phone.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on introducing this debate, which is on an important issue.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley), I received a letter from BT informing me that there would be phone box closures in my constituency. That brought a sense of déjà vu, because it reminded me—it might similarly remind others here today—of the Government's recent handling of post office closures. They passed the buck on that, and I hope, as the hon. Member for Gordon said, that the Minister will not choose to pass the buck today and blame it all on Ofcom, just as the Secretary of State has blamed post office closures on the Royal Mail.

Let us be clear about the universal service obligation imposed on BT by the Communications Act 2003, which was passed only last year. It clearly says that BT

> "are required to ensure the adequate provision of public call boxes and call box services throughout the UK to meet the reasonable needs of end users".

We heard the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) say that, in his constituency, this can be a matter of life and death. There have been instances in all our constituencies when people have not had mobile phones with them or where mobile phone coverage was not available, and the emergency services have been summoned in time only through the use of an available call box.

Ofcom's current assessment is that BT cannot and should not discriminate against vulnerable consumers, as we have heard today, because they may rely on payphones to access telecommunications. The Minister clearly agrees. In the Daily Express on 18 August, he said:

> "not everyone can afford a mobile or home phone".

He is, of course, right. BT and the Government must ensure that payphone users have access to competitive services equal to that of fixed-line users. Closing more than 9,000 call boxes does not fulfil this brief, or the requirements laid on BT by the Communications Act 2003.

There is still a real demand for payphones. Some 587 million calls a year are made from payphones, 9 per cent. of which are emergency calls made from call boxes, as we heard today. Moreover, many disadvantaged and minority groups use payphones extensively. A study carried out by Oftel in 2003, before Ofcom was founded, found that asylum seekers and non-white ethnic groups use payphones and PayCards regularly to make international calls to their homes and their loved ones, to keep costs down. The same survey found that more than 2 million adults use payphones regularly to call 0800 numbers. That point has not be raised today, but let us not forget that one cannot call an 0800 number free of charge from one's mobile phone. That is an important issue.

Some 39 per cent. of regular payphone users also have mobile phones, but mobile operators either charge for calls to freephone numbers, as I just said, or bar access altogether, so even if one is willing to pay, one cannot get through. Moreover, as we have heard, universal mobile coverage has still not been achieved, and I doubt that it will be achieved, because of the topography of the British isles. In rural and some urban areas, there are still large holes in the network, so there is no question of choice; consumers must use fixed-line phones. BT payphones therefore provide an important source through which people can access this service.

I fear that BT's removal of more than 9,000 phone boxes will disproportionately affect certain sectors of society—those who are deprived for one reason or another—as well as urban users and those in rural areas. I do not believe that the Government should pass the buck or allow those who cannot afford a mobile phone to be so disadvantaged. I shall quote the Minister again, if I may, as he has the disadvantage of having a constituency that is not very far from mine, so I get to see the same newspapers occasionally. In the Coventry Evening Telegraph on 16 August this year, he said:

> "the main thing is if they are taking away payphones, they ought to do it with some concern for areas where it will have a social impact. We need to make sure that we do not disproportionately hurt people who are already disadvantaged."

Mr. O'Brien indicated assent.

Michael Fabricant: The Minister agrees with himself: we need to ensure that we do not disproportionately hurt people who are already disadvantaged. He is right.

Mr. O'Brien: I am making the case for my constituents and for the Government, rather than for the hon. Gentleman, so perhaps he should not claim that he is the only one who supports call boxes.

Michael Fabricant: Had the Minister listened to the debate he would know very well that I am not the only one who supports call boxes, because I think everyone taking part in this debate supports them, apart from the Labour party. That is the point that we are all making.

A point that no one has raised, which is not trivial, is that 2,900 of the 9,000 call boxes that are to go will be the traditional red ones. Those red telephone boxes are a part of our heritage and are recognised as such by millions of people all over the world. The red telephone box is a great British icon. BT, of course, sees the matter rather differently. It states that > "the fact that a phone box is red is irrelevant as we plan our removals based on usage levels and the size of the community it serves".

That is a pure logical argument, but I do not think that the type of phone box should be irrelevant. We should try to protect our phone boxes—particularly our red phone boxes—in historic areas. I have a plea for a particularly nice type of historic area—cathedral cities, such as Lichfield.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman has raised a new point, which was brought to my attention by a constituent in New Radnor, who claimed that the six telephone boxes under threat there are all listed red telephone boxes. British Telecom now tells me that it is unable to close any telephone box that is listed.

Michael Fabricant: That is a very interesting and revealing point. I do not know whether I should reveal this, but I think I will. Several examples have been given of ways of using phone boxes without getting a connection, such as children ringing three times. I heard from an hon. Member, before the debate, that he was actually conceived in a red phone box, so an important issue is involved.

We have heard from several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury, about the financial aspect of the matter. Each phone box apparently costs on average £1,650 a year to maintain. Clearly that is a problem. However, the removal of so many call boxes is going too far. The Government must not allow BT to forget, as they allowed the Post Office to forget, that it is a universal public service provider.

The Minister gave an assurance, in an intervention, that that right of veto would not be taken away and that Ofcom is not considering that. That is not what Ofcom has said to several Opposition Members. Will the Minister make it clear whether the veto will still stand after the Ofcom consultation has been completed? It is now reviewing the universal service obligation, and that review will start next month. The consultation will last 12 weeks and will cover the whole issue of objections by public bodies.

I will not make an excuse for raising the issue of post office closures again, because I believe that the closures were shambolic. The Government must not be allowed to pass the buck to Ofcom. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling said, the Minister must come clean. BT is a public service provider, just like the Post Office. Will the Minister give Opposition Members an assurance that our payphones are safe in Government hands?

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): In the limited time available, I have several issues to deal with and shall try to cover as many as I can of the points that have been raised.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), who has raised an enormously important issue. Not only his constituents, but mine and those of other hon. Members, will be concerned about it. This has been a good debate and some important points have been raised. British Telecom needs to listen to the real concerns that have been expressed by hon. Members and take some of them on board when it next seeks to carry out consultations with local authorities and others about how call box closures take place.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) made a good point. He said that we should not just blame BT, that there is a wider problem of the growth in mobile phone use, and that Ofcom needs to look at the issues in an innovative way. He is right about that. For some time, the business conducted by public call box providers—especially BT—has been under increasing pressure. Mobile phone use has increased and call box use has decreased proportionately. Telecommunication is, of course, a privatised industry. Companies seek to make profits and that has led to call box operators deciding to scale back the provision of call boxes and remove some that they regard as underutilised or uneconomic.

Regulation of call box provision is a matter for the independent regulator, the Office of Communications. The Government set the broad overall framework, but the detailed regulation is entirely a matter for Ofcom. It always amazes me that we get Conservatives saying that we ought to privatise things, put them in the private sector, get the Government off people's backs and end Government interference, and then, as soon as things are privatised and there is an independent regulator, they say that the Government are passing the buck because they are not interfering enough. That is politics, but it is not serious; it is knockabout politics. What we are dealing with is a serious issue and people need to get a clear view of the way forward.

Over the past five years, it is certainly true that mobile phone penetration has increased to cover most of the population, except for the very young, some of the very old and those who are unable to afford a mobile phone or who have made a conscious decision—who can blame them?—not to have one. That has caused a sustained reduction in call box use and, from a commercial perspective, reduced the revenue that BT gets from payphones. However, the provision of public call boxes should not be seen just as a commercial venture that is part of BT's business.

The Government and Ofcom see the need to protect the provision of call boxes as an important means of social and economic inclusion. Although usage has been declining, call boxes are still well used by significant proportions of the population. The overall numbers may be small and users may be from particular groups, such as the young and low-income users, but they are people to whom there is an obligation, and that needs to be recognised.

The tension between the commercial and the public service issues was conveyed very well by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who said that we were talking about a private company with a public service obligation. We know that that private company has a real problem. Hon. Members do not want to lose their local call boxes—they do not want to lose that public facility—so Ofcom is undertaking a broader consultation about how we look at the public service obligation. I hope that the consultation, which is coming up shortly, will involve more than 17 people replying to Ofcom and that it will be ensured that hon. Members can voice in their concerns about the way in which the public service obligation operates.

Matthew Green: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: Will the hon. Gentleman excuse me? I have only three and half minutes left to reply and there is quite a lot I have to get through.

The call box network is protected by the universal service obligation and a right to object, in limited circumstances, on the part of local authorities. BT and Kingston, the providers of call boxes, fund that network, but Ofcom now needs to consider through a wide consultation how we can maintain reasonable access to call boxes for members of the public and how we can protect that network. The Government want broad accessibility of call boxes to the public, particularly to those groups who need them. I want to be clear on that.

I am also concerned by some of the points raised during the debate about BT's method of consulting on the issue, particularly in not making it clear to some local authorities that they have—effectively—a right of veto and can exercise that right. BT needs to take those points on board and to listen to the strong concerns expressed here. In the letter I saw about particular call boxes, I do not recall a reference to that veto, but I will look at that letter again. I think that, when they get told about proposals to close call boxes, Members of Parliament also need to be aware that there is a right of veto. That awareness needs to be raised.

The stories that we heard about the way that BT responded to—at least initial—inquiries by hon. Members are a matter of concern. BT needs to make sure that the consultation is carried out properly. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire also pointed out that consulting more widely with local authorities and with the LGA might well be in BT's interests when considering whether we can find a way forward. I hope that it will listen to that recommendation.

On the consultation that is taking place, I have asked for the situation in relation to the veto to be double-checked with Ofcom today. I must be clear about what it said. Removing the veto is not one of the options that it is considering. However, it is a consultation. Therefore, it may well be that others—perhaps BT—say that Ofcom ought to consider removing the veto. While Ofcom are not putting that forward as one of its options for change at this point—I am told by my officials who spoke to Ofcom today that it is right that removing the veto is not something that Ofcom is considering—it is possible that others may ask it to do so in the future. Therefore, my recommendation to all hon. Members is that when the consultation takes place, they should get in their two-pennyworth and make sure that they state their view about how the veto should be sustained in the long-term. It is certainly an issue.

We believe that the universal service obligation is fundamental to the regulation of telecommunications in the UK. It means that basic telephone services should be available to everyone on reasonable request and at an affordable price. That includes the provision of call boxes. Accordingly, the provision of call boxes has been included in the Department of Trade and Industry's Electronic Communications (Universal Service), Order 2003, which was made under the Communications Act 2003. It sets out the framework for Ofcom to set out the detail of call box regulation. It preserves the provision of call boxes to meet the reasonable needs of end users in terms of geographical coverage, numbers of call boxes and quality of service.

One of the concerns raised is about rural areas. Before I close, I will say a word on that. BT should recognise that there are areas that mobile phones do not cover. There are areas that particular providers of mobile phone services are unable to access. In other words, there are blackspots. Therefore, it is necessary to have some call box coverage in those areas.

The way in which the rules for removing a call box operate means that there needs to be a 42-day consultation period. Where it is the case that the local council has not been made aware by BT of its right to veto a closure, and has therefore not been able to make a recommendation in the 42-day period, I hope that BT will consider allowing the local council to raise the issue with it subsequently and take on board the local council's concern that a call box should not be closed.

Osteoporosis (Dorset)

11 am

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): This is an important debate, particularly for the 3 million people affected by osteoporosis, for many of my constituents in Poole and for other people in Dorset, where we have a high age profile. It is a major problem in the area.

Osteoporosis affects one in three women and between one in 12 and one in eight men over the age of 50. Over the next 50 years, it is predicted that the level of osteoporosis will double, mainly because of the ageing population.

Osteoporosis is often passed off as a normal facet of ageing, rather than a serious condition that requires treatment. However, without treatment, osteoporosis can be painful and debilitating. Every two minutes, someone has a fracture due to osteoporosis, resulting in more than 200,000 fractures a year. Sometimes, those are a major factor in mortality. Nearly one in five people who suffer a fracture die within a year. The cost to the national health service and the wider economy is between £1.7 billion and £1.8 billion a year.

As well as causing considerable pain, osteoporosis has major implications for NHS resources. More than 800,000 hospital bed nights each year are accounted for by patients with hip fractures in England alone. Patients with spinal fractures visit their GP an additional 14 times in a year following a fracture. Osteoporosis will have a major and growing impact on the NHS.

Apart from the overall situation, osteoporosis has a tremendous impact on individuals. Broken bones due to osteoporosis can result in pain, deformity, depression, anxiety, social isolation and death. Up to one in three hip fracture patients die within a year, and some surveys show that 80 per cent. of elderly women at high risk of hip fracture would rather die than have a bad hip fracture and lose their independence. Fear of falling and breaking bones can prevent women from enjoying a normal retirement, and osteoporosis can prevent patients from doing many ordinary daily activities.

Osteoporosis is a preventable condition. Strong bones can continue to be built up to the age of 35. Therefore, the earlier in life that a healthy lifestyle is adopted, the greater the benefits. Key risk factors include lack of physical activity, smoking, excessive alcohol, and low calcium and vitamin D intake.

The difficulty nationally with osteoporosis is that it tends to form part of lots of other strategies. The Government have a preventing falls strategy and there is a national service framework for older people. Osteoporosis is a part of both. However, it is sometimes not the focus, and remains under-prioritised. That is one of the reasons why I want to raise the issue in the House of Commons, and I am glad to see the Minister of State here today.

My interest was increased by a visit to the offices of Osteoporosis Dorset, a local charity partly funded by the Dorset and Somerset strategic health authority, which funds the osteoporosis prevention officer, Mrs. Carol Jones. I met the chairman, Group Captain John Rees. They went through some of the things that they do. I intend to point out what can be done, because prevention and work in the community are important in dealing with the problem.

Osteoporosis Dorset was established in 1992 to reduce the incidence of fractures in the county. From its inception, it has received support from the Dorset health authority. Its scientific advisory group developed a clear strategy built around the rubric "Prevention through education", using a high-risk-group approach. The groups were defined as women with early menopause before 45 years; men and women on long-term corticosteroids; patients presenting with low-trauma fractures; residential care-home residents, for whom Osteoporosis Dorset has been instrumental in introducing hip protectors; and elderly people living at home, the strategies for whom have included falls templates, calcium and vitamin D, and hip protectors.

Much work and money was dedicated to piloting the ideas and developing protocols for the management of those groups of individuals at high risk of osteoporosis. In addition, the charity formed a nurse network known as the Bone Alliance, which trained practice nurses—at no cost to the individual or practice—in how to support their patients. That local organisation does a lot of excellent work in advising GPs. One point that has been raised with me is that, because osteoporosis is not part of the GP contract, GPs do not necessarily pay it adequate attention. In Poole, the organisation helps to make up for that by providing information and expertise. It has also developed a network of osteoporosis patient peer support groups, [illegible] well as securing funding from the Department of Health to become one of eight national pre-retirement health check pilot sites, details of which it is working on. We benefit greatly from the work of the charity and its local organisation.

One of the major benefits of Osteoporosis Dorset is that, early in its existence, it came across hip protectors, which were developed in Denmark and are widely used on the continent. They are useful devices. I shall show how and try to explain for Hansard. They give protection to people who are at risk of fracturing their hips, help to absorb the shock if they fall over, and provide additional protection during recovery if they have to have hip surgery. They cost only £32 plus VAT each, and Poole primary care trust is very good in that it provides them for people living in homes in the Poole area. I understand that some neighbouring primary care trusts do not provide them.

Let me demonstrate. Essentially, they are pants with pads on either side—not the most stylish items in the world, but very practical. They do an excellent job in providing protection for those in homes whose hips are at risk from falls. This practical idea could be rather more widely used in order to save people the agony that results from falling and breaking their hips.

There are many other ways in which we could tackle osteoporosis. There is no formal national screening programme for it, which means that, apart from certain groups such as those taking corticosteroids, and thus receiving regular screening, most patients are unaware that they have osteoporosis and are diagnosed only when they suffer fractures. One million women in the UK are identified for possible treatment, most commonly at the time of fracture.

A screening programme ought to be considered. That would be a way of identifying those who are prone to osteoporosis. A range of treatments can be used: bisphosphonates, non-hormonal drugs that help to maintain bone density and reduce fracture rates; calcium and vitamin D supplements, which can reduce the risk of hip fractures; hormone replacement therapy for women; and selective estrogen receptor modulators, drugs that act on the bone in a similar way to oestrogen and help to maintain bone density.

There have been developments. I noticed an article in the Daily Mail on 5 October about a drug called Bonviva, a bisphosphonate that is being developed by Roche, and which would have to be taken monthly by those with osteoporosis. One problem is that, although some 650,000 women currently receive drug treatment for the condition, there is evidence that not all of them take the drug as often as they should. It would be beneficial if there were a pill that could be taken once a month and slowly released the drug into the blood stream.

I would be interested to hear the Minister's comments on drug treatment for the condition. There could be substantial savings in having a range of drugs; I have pointed out the cost of some of the treatments for osteoporosis. It is a preventable condition that has not received the attention that it needs in order to be given priority by the relevant parts of the national health service. It forms part of the preventing falls strategy and the national service framework for older people, but has not received the focus that it ought to have. I know that the National Osteoporosis Society does very good work, and Osteoporosis Dorset also does good work, but the matter requires a greater focus from the Government. We ought to consider whether to carry out more screening and put more investment into prevention, so that we not only save considerable sums of money, but avoid the tying up of substantial numbers of hospital beds as a result of people going in with fractures.

As we have heard, people with one fracture often get further fractures, which can cause problems. We ought to revisit the GP contract on this matter, and GPs ought to regard osteoporosis as a greater priority. The topic is important. Fractures impact greatly on the lives of older people. If we are serious about saving money and improving the quality of life of some of our elder citizens, the condition should be treated as a higher priority by the Government and the NHS. If it were and we invested more in prevention, we could reduce the number of cases of osteoporosis substantially.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Before we proceed, I would like to place one matter on the record. The hon. Gentleman produced an exhibit and described it articulately, tastefully and with care for the record. I would not wish it to be thought that the fact that I allowed him to do so should be regarded as a precedent in any way.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) on securing the debate. I know that many of the issues that he raised are of great importance to his constituents and to him. He set out clearly many of the facts and figures relating to osteoporosis. I share his concern that we should do everything we can to reduce the suffering caused by the condition. I hope that I shall be able to reassure him that the Department of Health, the national health service and other key stakeholders have put in place a programme to do just that. I hope that I can illustrate that we are making the matter a priority and will continue to do so.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned screening. In 2000, the NHS plan announced an initiative to identify five pilot sites in England to provide advice and health checks for people entering retirement. That was managed by the Health Development Agency and ran from 2001 to 2003. As he is aware, South and East Dorset primary care trust, in collaboration with Osteoporosis Dorset, a well respected charitable trust, were involved in one of the five national pre-retirement health check pilots for women aged between 56 and 65.

The aim of the pilots was to identify risk factors and to implement strategies to reduce the risk of osteoporosis fractures, heart attacks, stroke and diabetes. Following the pilots, a major implementation programme has been put in place at the Health Development Agency, using the evidence from the pilot phase, so that practitioners and policy makers can focus services on those particular age groups.

My Department and the Welsh Assembly Government have asked the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to develop clinical guidelines and technology appraisals on what is effective in the prevention and treatment of osteoporosis, the assessment of fracture risk and the prevention of fractures in individuals at high risk—the hon. Gentleman highlighted the preventive aspect—and the assessment and prevention of falls in older people.

The technology appraisals of prevention and treatment of osteoporosis include consideration of five osteoporosis drugs, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The appraisal is split into two parts: primary and secondary prevention. The primary prevention part is due to be published in September 2005, after which the second part will be published, although we do not yet have a date for that. The appraisals are designed to give doctors the latest evidence-based information on the most effective treatments for osteoporosis. However, it is also important to patients and carers to have access to clear, authoritative advice on both the sort of care that might be best for them, and the standards of care they can expect from the NHS.

The fracture risk guideline, which is due to be completed in June 2005, will look at all groups recognised to be at high risk of osteoporotic fracture. It will examine the interventions that can be used to prevent fractures and cover primary care, secondary NHS health care and the professionals who have direct contact with and make decisions about the care of high-risk individuals. The guideline will also look at areas where collaboration is needed between primary and secondary NHS services. Fracture risk would apply because of the very issues that the hon. Gentleman highlighted about the need to provide ongoing preventive care and to ensure that primary and secondary care services work closely together.

The falls guideline is due to be completed in November this year. It will provide recommendations for good practice that, again, are based on the best available evidence of clinical and cost-effectiveness.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the national service framework for older people. I hope that we might consider the appraisals and the guidelines as building on the work on standard six of the NSF, rather than think of them as separate. That is certainly one of the key policy drivers on osteoporosis. The framework sets clear milestones for the planning and development of integrated falls services and requires that such services should be established across all health and social care systems by April 2005.

Good progress is being made across the country in implementing that, but the decisions are sometimes local, in line with "Shifting the Balance of Power". However, the Department will monitor the April 2005 milestone through the strategic health authorities. We are also collecting information from a sample of health and social care communities on all the NSF standards to enable us to assess progress on implementation. That information will feed into the Healthcare Commission's in-depth review of progress on the framework. That is what we are doing to ensure that we can drive through the proposals and have a consistent service across the country.

I congratulate and pay tribute to all the staff and stakeholders in the Dorset health economy for their commitment to delivering and improving osteoporosis services for local people. As the hon. Gentleman said, osteoporosis services in Dorset are co-ordinated through a partnership between the Dorset health community and Osteoporosis Dorset. The Dorset and Somerset strategic health authority has assured me that that model of service provision is working extremely well and has resulted in the county being perceived as one of the lead areas in developing innovative, evidence-based approaches to fracture reduction. I am sure that he and his constituents are proud of that long-term arrangement, which has been operating in Dorset since 1992.

I have been assured that the details necessary to maintain an ongoing arrangement are at present being agreed by the Bournemouth Teaching primary care trust, which is the NHS organisation leading the relationship with Osteoporosis Dorset, on behalf of all primary care trusts in Dorset. I am also assured that all the primary care trusts in the Dorset and Somerset strategic health authority area are committed to delivering on this high-priority national service framework milestone and are developing integrated osteoporosis strategies as part of their overall falls strategy. I am informed that plans are being implemented to ensure that the integrated falls service, which was developed by primary care trusts in line with local partners, is in place by March 2005.

I have been illustrating some of the ways in which, nationally, we are setting the milestones and, locally, there is implementation. The hon. Gentleman asked about GP contracts. It is true that in a sense osteoporosis did not make it into the quality and outcomes framework, perhaps because there was not enough evidence-based information to make that possible. I have reviewed some of the issues around that. We are trying to build that information consistently by reviewing the pilot studies, the NICE guidelines and how we implement national service frameworks, and an independent review group is considering the GP contract and how new indicators can be included from April 2006 if new evidence emerges in those areas.

I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that the increase in spending in the NHS overall—particularly the amount of money that is allocated at local level through devolved decision making—is allowing the development of extra services and ensuring that we can fund many of them. That is not to say that we are in any way complacent about what needs to be done.

I note the hon. Gentleman's comments about, and vivid illustration of, hip protectors—I now completely know what they look like—for people with osteoporosis, and I understand his desire for more consistency in how they are funded and provided locally. Current NICE draft guidelines on prevention and treatment of falls consider the use of hip protectors, but conclude that the evidence is not strong enough to support a firm recommendation for their use as an effective preventative measure for all people with osteoporosis. However, that appraisal is still in progress. Hip protectors are available free if they are provided by the NHS following an individual assessment of clinical need. I know that all NHS organisations in Dorset continue to make provision for that as necessary.

I reiterate that I do not underestimate the enormous burden of this debilitating disease. As the hon. Gentleman said, about 310,000 osteoporotic fractures occur each year. There is absolutely no doubt that, because of the ageing UK population, that number is set to increase. He was right to point to work that still needs to be done regarding preventive measures such as diet. The issue of how we can use diet more effectively to prevent some of the conditions that arise from poor diet is being considered in the public health White Paper.

It is only by collective and collaborative work across sectors and professions and, of course, by properly engaging with older people that we will be able to make a difference to people's lives. We need to work at a national level, build on the best practice that has been illustrated so vividly and excellently in Dorset, and consider what further measures can be taken, not least by examining relevant public health issues.

I hope that my comments have given the hon. Gentleman some assurance that we take this issue seriously and that we are working towards the clear goal of doing everything we can to reduce the effects of osteoporosis and to prevent it from occurring in the first place.

West Mercia Police (Funding)

2 pm

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to raise this important matter in this Chamber. I am pleased that so many of my colleagues have turned up today to make their concerns known as well. I wish to put on the record my support and appreciation of the work undertaken by the local police. Forgive me for being parochial for just a moment or two, but the leadership of Chief Superintendent Simon Adams, who is the divisional commander of South Worcestershire, the work tackling antisocial behaviour in Warndon villages of Sergeant Chris Allen, the community engagement in St. Johns of Police Constable Tina Dodd, and the local knowledge that community support officer Lee Russell has gained just by walking his beat, and that he uses to cut crime in Warndon, are just a few examples of the really good work that our local police force does in a difficult and challenging job.

However, this debate centres on finance, to which I now turn. The nomination process for the financial year 2004–05 has left a challenge that must be met by West Mercia in its budget setting for 2005–06: a notional reduction of £517,000. That point was clearly made to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions and me at a meeting with the local police authority. Unfortunately, she cannot be here at this moment. If hon. Members look at the Annunciator, they will see exactly why.

The Association of Police Authorities has recently highlighted the fact that police authorities will need a 5.5 per cent. increase in their budgets next year just to maintain current levels of service. That is largely due to the cost of salaries and the commitments arising from the unfunded police pension scheme, about which I shall say more later. I understand that the rate of so-called police inflation is increasingly recognised, and I would welcome any observations that the Minister has on the matter that may help West Mercia and other police authorities in their financial planning.

West Mercia shares the position of other police authorities. The 2004–05 budget requirement of £165.8 million will need to increase by £8.9 million, or 5.4 per cent, to maintain current policies. Broadly speaking, £5.3 million is due to increased pay and other inflation, £1.2 million is for police pension commitments and £1.9 million is for unavoidable commitments, such as salary increments following the increase in the number of police officers and the local government pension contributions for the civilian staff. An increase of only 3 per cent. in police grant—£3.2 million—would leave a shortfall of £5.7 million to be found from the council tax, which would have to increase by 9.8 per cent., raising the band D rate to £151.14. I repeat that those figures are for maintaining the status quo. They make no provision for matters pressing on West Mercia such as improved custody facilities, improvements to call handling and increased calls to tackle antisocial behaviour.

Before I press the Minister on areas where I hope that she can use her influence to help West Mercia, I would like to spend some time exploring the background to the funding problems and try to shed some light on them. It has been said in some Government quarters that West Mercia is a high-spending police authority. Let me put the record straight. The average spend per head of population for 2004–05 for all police authorities is £182.82. West Mercia is the fourth lowest at £141.97. Even taking just the shire forces, the average spend per head is £151, and West Mercia is well below that. Narrowing the field even more to include just the most similar forces as our comparator, the average is £143.07—still higher than West Mercia. There is no way that one could describe West Mercia as a high-spending, profligate authority.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. He is absolutely right to compare West Mercia with other rural forces and not with urban forces. Will he deal with the issue of sparsity in his speech? Although it may not be a factor in Worcester, it certainly is in Herefordshire, parts of Shropshire and parts of Worcestershire. In reality, the £2.3 million that the constabulary receives from the Government to account for the sparsity factor has not increased in line with inflation in recent years. Does he hope that it will in future, and does he agree that the money should be ring-fenced to deal with the real issues of policing in rural areas?

Mr. Foster: I shall obviously have to call immediately for a leak inquiry. Information must have gone from my office to that of the hon. Gentleman because he makes the exact point that I want to make later in my contribution.

The council tax band D levels show that West Mercia portrays itself in an unfavourable light. The 2004–05 precept is £137.69, which is higher than the national average of £126.33, higher than the shire force average of £121.12 and higher than the most similar force average of £123.06. We must accept that council tax is higher for West Mercia. Having established that it is not a high-spending police authority, why is it necessary for it to be a relatively high precept-levying authority? The answer lies in the third part of the funding triangle—Government grant per head of population. In West Mercia's case, I would call it the Bermuda triangle, because things seem to go missing in it.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that West Mercia finds itself in its current position partly because of the brave decision that the police authority took about two years ago to recruit hundreds of new police officers? I understand that the current force strength stands at about 2,400 officers. That was a brave decision, and I hope that the Government and the Minister will respond by ensuring that the authority, having taken that decision, is provided with a good platform of grant in future.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In fact, I think that those police officer numbers are at the highest level since the constabulary was formed in 1967, which is testimony to what my hon. Friend describes as a brave local decision.

The average Government grant for all police forces is £138.11 per head, while West Mercia's is £92.24. Shire forces average £107.16 per head, and most similar forces average £99.07 per head. This is the core of the problem.

If West Mercia received the all-force average Government grant per head of population, it would receive an additional £53.6 million to spend. If it received the shire force average, it would have £17.4 million more to spend, and if it received the most similar force average Government grant per head it would get £7.9 million more to spend each and every year.

We must view that information in the context of what I have already explained is a requirement to spend an extra £8.9 million next year just to stand still. Raising £1 million from council tax only would limit the increase to £2.38, or 1.7 per cent. All the police forces in England and Wales that surround West Mercia receive a higher Government grant per head than West Mercia. I believe that the Minister will agree that crime does not respect local administrative boundaries, even though funding seems to. In the small island state that we live in, people do not understand why postcode lotteries still exist.

As a resident and council tax payer in West Mercia, I accept—as my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) has mentioned—that local decisions have also been made to increase council tax to pay for additional police services. For example, the 2002–03 budget proposed to recruit an additional 300 police officers, all funded locally. Indeed, that contributed to the council tax increase of 33.1 per cent. experienced that year but—significantly, because of the manner in which council tax capping has been used this year—the decision also has annual council tax consequences.

Using figures supplied by the police authority, I estimate the additional marginal cost of activity associated with employing those 300 officers to be £4.28 on council tax. That is in addition to the direct employment costs identified back in 2002–03. Deducting the whole cost of employing those 300 officers from the police budget would see the band D precept reduce to £119.10, saving some £18.59 over the year. That brings the council tax below the national force average, the shire force average and the most similar force average.

However, at a philosophical level, should that decision be held against West Mercia in council tax capping decisions? I have a real problem with arguing that it should. Delegating to local people powers to improve their local police force is a way of empowering them to respond to local need and it provides a mechanism to give greater democratic accountability to the police force. I find it difficult to argue the case that local people should be penalised for actively seeking a local solution to what they consider to be local problems.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): I want to reiterate the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright). According to the figures that I have seen, there has been an increase of something like 30 per cent. in staff numbers at West Mercia over the past seven years. We now have 4,000 police officers and support staff, whereas before we had 3,100. The benefits are obvious for all to see. There are 40 additional police officers patrolling the streets of my constituency. There are 21 community support officers in Telford and Wrekin and I have just written a letter to the Minister encouraging her to fund more. How many letters has my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) had from constituents complaining about the increase in the precept of West Mercia police? Perhaps he will also tell us how many letters he has received from ordinary local council tax payers objecting to the increase in the council tax levied by his council.

Mr. Foster: I confess that I have indeed received one letter complaining about the 2002–03 police precept increase. It was a case that I know that the police authority is well aware of and it has involved a prolonged exchange of correspondence. However, I have received numerous letters from my constituents applauding the work that the police are doing in cutting antisocial behaviour and crime generally. They far outweigh the single letter that I received in 2002–03.

My hon. Friend makes an important point about staff numbers increasing, because it is not just the increase in police officer numbers that is relevant; the civilianisation of the police force, which means that more operational officers can go on the beat, is also an important way in which we can manage the resources that we have.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Just for the record, I have had a lot of letters complaining about the increase in precept.

Mr. Foster: I take that point on board. I am not in a position to dispute it one way or the other. Of course, it matters that the police authority undertook proper consultation. Community policing boards agreed to the precept increase and that was supported by an opinion poll survey conducted in January 2002 among 500 residents of West Mercia, which found that 71 per cent. of people supported adding 50p a week to their council tax specifically to pay for 300 extra officers. That figure rose to 81 per cent. when people were asked about adding 30p to recruit 100 extra officers. Only 19 per cent. were not in favour of any increase at all.

Having established, I hope, that West Mercia is a low-spending force, albeit with a relatively high council tax precept as a result of the low level of Government grant, it is worth looking at whether West Mercia uses those resources efficiently. The most recent baseline report produced by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary identifies West Mercia as delivering high levels of performance. It has consistently more than delivered the efficiency targets demanded of it. Some £16.5 million of efficiency gains has been delivered over the past five years. The HMIC report ranks the strategic management and the performance management of the force as excellent. It states that the authority has a strong record of effective budgetary control. I am doubly delighted about that because I know that at least two of my former students work in that department at the police authority—but no doubt the director of finance, Mr. Stephen Howarth, would also like to claim some credit for that.

West Mercia has one of the best performing estate management functions in the country. PricewaterhouseCoopers suggested in its external audit letter of 2002–03 that the force's report was one of the best that the auditor had issued. The force collaborates nationally and regionally to ensure best practice and procurement, and has consistently used civilian staff to release police officers for operational duties. Crime is falling in West Mercia, especially in the South Worcestershire division with which I am most familiar.

[Mr. Foster]

The most recent figures for the city of Worcester show that between April and August 2004, compared with the same period last year, robbery was down by 59 per cent., vehicle crime down by 34 per cent., burglary down by 11 per cent. and violent crime down by 2 per cent. Of the violent crimes committed, 72 per cent. are detected. In the police performance monitoring report 2003–04, produced last month, West Mercia shows year-on-year improvement or above average performance in citizen focus, reducing crime, investigating crime, promoting public safety, providing assistance and resource usage—in short, all six performance measures that the Home Office uses.

However, like me, West Mercia wants the force to improve on what it does. That is why I should like to press the Minister for help with several matters. Let me make it quite clear that in calling for her assistance, I do not want to hear from her that salvation lies in a financial fairy godmother dressed in orange who, slapper-like, promises to take everyone to the ball—that is the Lib Dem way. Nor do I want to be fobbed off by revelations that some fantasy island exists far, far away, paved with cash to pay for more police funding—that is the Conservative way. I live in the real world, and I want real help.

First, the Minister will know of my support for West Mercia's bid for 40 extra community support officers. Achieving success in that bid will help to overcome some of the funding shortfalls that I highlighted earlier. Will she assure me that she will look favourably on that bid? I understand that such bids are usually heavily oversubscribed, and the Minister might be tempted to prioritise areas that do not yet have CSOs. I ask her, however, not to ignore those forces that took up the challenge to begin with and helped to pioneer the deployment of CSOs.

The second matter is the police grant for 2005–06. I hope that I have convinced the Minister of our case for increased grant, but I am well aware of the three-year formula freeze. I ask the Minister to consider granting area cost adjustment to West Mercia in the medium to long term, which would raise an extra £1.7 million on this year's figures if we received the same rate as neighbouring Gloucestershire. I also ask her to examine more closely the details of the formula. For example, low incomes as calculated through the working families tax credit could be used as a deprivation indicator, rather than just income support claimant counts, which count only the unemployed. Such a change was, interestingly, made for the education formula spending share last time it was reviewed.

Will the Minister use her influence over colleagues at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in discussions about local government finance? The following bodies had nominated or designated budgets this year: Herefordshire unitary authority, Hereford and Worcester combined fire authority, Telford and Wrekin council, and West Mercia police authority. It is glaringly obvious that there is a geographical bias unwittingly built into the system, as all those bodies lie in the West Mercia area. That reinforces the case that colleagues and I have made on behalf of Worcestershire county council over several years. For 2004–05 a standard increase in grant of 3.25 per cent. was paid to all police forces, meaning that none lost out comparatively. I know that the Home Office is under pressure to scrap such a floors-and-ceilings scheme, but I ask for such floors to be adopted again in the short term so that West Mercia is not penalised any further.

Thirdly, West Mercia currently receives the welcome rural sparsity grant that the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) mentioned. It was first set up in 2001 and was ring-fenced to protect forces such as West Mercia. It brings in £2.3 million. Given what I said about the police grant, I ask the Minister to retain the grant as it is and not to incorporate it into the mainstream police grant. The rural sparsity grant exists because of the known higher cost of policing in rural areas. A small matter that has been pointed out is that, since its creation in 2001, the rural sparsity grant has not been increased in line with inflation. The Minister may want to correct that.

Finally, I urge the Minister to consider what I call nationalisation of the police pension scheme to avoid instability in levying council tax. Like all other forces, West Mercia funds its pension liabilities itself. Of course, that can vary from year to year depending on the age and the retirement profile of police officers. If that responsibility were taken away from the force and funding allocated centrally, local council tax payers would not see so much variation in council tax increases each year.

It is not doom and gloom in West Mercia—far from it. Crime is falling; police numbers are at record levels; CSOs are patrolling our streets and helping to tackle antisocial behaviour using the new tools. Divisions such as South Worcestershire are at the forefront of best practice in combating antisocial behaviour, including the use of dispersal zones. There is a real sense of ambition to press ahead to meet even greater challenges and to improve performance further. In the background, there are the financial constraints that I described. We want the Minister to use whatever influence she can to help West Mercia achieve even more.

2.21 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am glancing around to see how many colleagues are trying to catch your eye. I make it three more before we cut off at 3 o'clock, so we have a bit longer than we thought.

Having said that, there is, in many senses, not a great deal left to say; the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) said most of it. However, what is worth saying is worth repeating and I intend to do that, in part at least. I congratulate him on securing the debate. A number of us applied for it and he won the prize, so he got the opportunity to make the important points first. On that issue there is, largely, consensus in the three counties.

I do not agree with a couple of the things that the hon. Gentleman said. I will get them out of the way at the beginning so that I can return to a spirit of consensus. First, I regret the national policy points that he made, because there is genuine disagreement between the three parties about how to fund the overall level of public service expenditure. The issue that we are debating is not national policy, which is irrelevant; it is how the national pot is split between the geographical areas. That is the crucial issue. I happen to think that he is wrong about Conservative party policy and that his Government's policy is wrong, but that is irrelevant.

The issue is: how do we get a fair share of what the Government who are in power make available? The hon. Gentleman made the point about the obvious geographical issue so powerfully towards the end of his speech. If all those authorities are being capped, nominated, warned and threatened, something has gone wrong with the system.

The other thing that I disagreed with was the implication that the hon. Gentleman was led on to by his hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) that the level of council tax is acceptable. I have had many letters of protest from my constituents—I do not know how many off the top of my head, but 20, 30 or 40, which is quite a lot—complaining about the level of the council tax increase and always highlighting the police grant as one of the most unacceptable increases of all. So there is resistance to further council tax increases and we need to recognise that people on low and fixed incomes—across the country but certainly in my constituency—cannot tolerate further significant real-terms increases in council tax across any of the component precepting authorities. We must work towards a system in which they do not have to face those large increases.

Peter Bradley: For the record, there have been complaints in my constituency about the level of council tax, but they are directed at the local authority and not at West Mercia police authority. I doubt that there is a single Member here, or anywhere else in West Mercia, who made representations to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that West Mercia should be capped.

Mr. Luff: I am grateful for that clarification. In Worcester and Wychavon, we are lucky that the district councils have kept the increase in line with inflation for their own precepting. However, the police precept is growing every year. If it increases in absolute and relative terms each year, clearly it becomes more of a problem and a bigger component of the council tax.

Let us get back to areas that we agree on. The trouble is that the situation is "Here we go again". Worcestershire seems to do badly on everything—schools, social services, fire authority, even health expenditure. I think that the same is true of Herefordshire and Shropshire too, but it is certainly true of Worcestershire.—[Interruption.]—My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) will, I am sure, speak for Shropshire.

Mr. Keetch: Who will speak for Herefordshire?

Mr. Luff: I will speak for Herefordshire as well. I will happily speak for the whole of West Mercia, because we agree that there is a shared problem of considerable dimensions.

I agree with what the hon. Member for Worcester said in his comprehensive opening remarks. We have a very efficient and well run police authority. I, too, pay tribute to our new chief constable, Paul West, who is an outstanding chief officer; to chief superintendent Simon Adams, a truly excellent policeman whom the hon. Gentleman and I share as divisional commander; and to my local district inspector, Steve Booker, a first rate policeman who looks after Wychavon. We are very lucky in the officers that we have, but the problems are there and they are very real.

The hon. Gentleman gave some figures, but I do not think that he gave the following. If I am repeating the ones that he gave, I am sorry, but the point is that all our neighbouring police authorities receive more from Government than we do. Not surprisingly, the West Midlands—the biggest—receives £150.01 per head of population; Gwent receives £130.01; North Wales receives £117.48; Cheshire receives £109.76; Dyfed-Powys receives £105.09; Staffordshire receives £104.27; Gloucestershire receives £103.88; Warwickshire receives £97.07; and poor old West Mercia at the bottom receives £92.24, which is by far the lowest—the ring in the middle of the doughnut. Even dragging us up to Warwickshire's apparently low level would give us an extra £5 million in central Government grant. By my calculation—which differs slightly from that of the hon. Gentleman—bringing us up to the average for most similar forces, which is probably the best measure to use, would give us an extra £6.83 million. That would be a significant bonus.

Nationally, police authorities are saying, "Please can we have a 5.4 per cent. to 5.5 per cent. grant increase this year?" I would ask for that on behalf of West Mercia, too. The Government are talking about increasing grants to public authorities in line with inflation. Governments have always done that; this Government are doing it and the previous Government did it. The trouble is, however, that such grants are largely grants to pay salaries and pensions, and salaries and pensions go up by more than inflation. The figure that the Government should use as the measure by which they increase grants is the increase in average wages, because it would be fairer. The problem of police pensions, rightly highlighted by the hon. Member for Worcester, compounds the problem. I share his plea to keep the floors and the ceilings. They are crucial to resolving this problem and their removal would be devastating for West Mercia constabulary.

I want to make the point about neighbours again. The hon. Gentleman rightly talked about area cost adjustment. It is iniquitous that we do not receive that adjustment. When I canvass and knock on doors in my constituency, I am amazed by the number of West Midlands police officers whom I find living in Droitwich. The West Midlands, which gets area cost adjustment for the extra cost of recruiting and paying officers, gets that money and then takes them from the West Mercia area. I always love meeting police officers, but it always galls me to think that such a police officer is judged by the Government to be worth more than a similar officer living next door but working for a different police authority.

Mr. Keetch: Does the hon. Gentleman know that in my part of Herefordshire, wonderfully commanded by Kevin Bentley, the divisional commander, we have officers working for Gloucestershire constabulary? It is not only Warwickshire and the West Midlands that receive the adjustment but Gloucestershire and Cheshire. Once again, when compared with our neighbours we are being badly treated.

Mr. Luff: It is a delight to agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right, and there is no justification for maintaining that discrimination when all the other forces around us are getting so much more.

[Mr. Luff]

My figures for the amount we would receive at Gloucestershire's level of area cost adjustment are the same as those of the hon. Member for Worcester—about another £1.7 million, which would make a big difference. I have received encouraging reassurances from the Minister about the rural sparsity grant. It is an important grant, which we must maintain.

Pensions lie at the heart of the difficulty. Perhaps the Minister will say something in her winding-up speech about the Government's overall plans for police pensions. West Mercia does not face a unique problem; it is shared across the whole country. It is a difficult nettle to grasp, but unless it is grasped soon, it threatens to undermine the whole system of police funding for the foreseeable future. The issue is important not just in West Mercia but across the country.

I am sceptical, in the best sense of the word, about community support officers. I would rather have real police officers than two-thirds police officers. My chief constable is working firmly, clearly and authoritatively to persuade me that I am wrong. He may yet persuade me; I am not yet there.

Peter Bradley: May I put this right? They are not substitutes, proxies or semi-police officers. They are what they say they are: community support officers. They play a crucial role in the community. As I said earlier, we have 21, with more to come, in Telford and Wrekin. They have been widely welcomed, not only when they were introduced but ever since, for the presence and reassurance they provide and for the work that they do to address low-level crime, which has such a high-level impact on community life.

Mr. Luff: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. It is a point of view; it is not one that I happen to share. I would rather have real, fully-fledged police officers with all the powers available to them. I will not get into a debate about community support officers now; we are talking about West Mercia.

However, given that we have such people and that the Government want them to exist in greater numbers, I want us to have a reasonable whack of them. I have written in support of the bid from the West Mercia constabulary for additional community support officers. How much better would it be if we were offered extra police officers instead?

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): There is an important point here. Our main beef is the unfairness of the current system and the way in which central funds are distributed. Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem with community support officers is that certain funds are allotted purely to funding support officers, not necessarily policemen? Our chief constable and others might, given a free choice, spend their money on real police officers.

Mr. Luff: I would prefer it if one single cheque came from the Government to West Mercia police authority every year, so that it could decide its priorities free of the wretched targets that distort the way in which policing is conducted in West Mercia.

David Wright rose—

Mr. Luff: I am trying to draw my remarks to a conclusion, but I will give way one last time.

David Wright: The hon. Gentleman is being most generous, as he always is. The chief constable has made it clear to me and to other Members in meetings that CSOs count as civilian staff in the West Mercia force calculations. We are not talking about police officers; there have been more police officer posts and CSO staff, who are counted as civilian staff. There is no hidden bureaucracy in terms of civilianisation—they are counted in that way.

Mr. Luff: I did not suggest that there was, and if the hon. Gentleman thought that I did, that was quite wrong. Those people are obviously low-level police officers, although they may count as civilians, but I would rather have a fully-fledged policeman or woman. I would rather pay a little extra and get somebody fully qualified, with all the powers of arrest and detention that these people ought to have. This is a separate debate, but if there are extra policing resources, whatever shape they take, we want our fair share. [Laughter.] I am sorry if hon. Members find that amusing, but I think that they would find it equally amusing if I backed a bid for community support officers without making it clear that I would rather we did not have them. I would rather have police officers.

Peter Bradley: Stop digging.

Mr. Luff: I would rather have police officers.

We have had a welcome increase in police officers over recent years, but that has been paid for by council tax payers. There is a limit to what the council tax payer can bear. In my judgment, we have the absolute minimum level of policing in West Mercia. It is true that we live in a relatively low-crime area. There has apparently been some success, although detection rates could improve.

A stack of crimes goes on in Wychavon, which I know about, and which the police tell me that they do not have the resources to police. They range from fly tipping to immigration to driving offences related to illegal gangmaster activity. If we had the resources, we could deal with those offences. We need more police officers, and I do not think that the council tax payer should have to pay for them. It is about time that Government—not this Government, but Government in general—gave Worcestershire the fair deal that it has lacked for so long.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I also thank the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) for obtaining this debate, and doing such a brilliant job on the brief, which I am sure that we have all received, so that none of us has to remember the masses of figures that he produced.

This is a vital issue for the whole of West Mercia. I want to remind the Minister, who does not come from particularly nearby, what West Mercia is. The name derives from the Welsh marches, so we are men of the marches. In Bewdley in my constituency, there is even still an area called Catchem's End, which is just the English side of the River Severn. We believe that that was the last place where the Welsh could be caught on their way back to Wales. Or was it the last place where they could catch the English on the way back to England?

Mr. Keetch: Just as a point of historical fact, in the precincts of Hereford cathedral close one is still permitted to shoot Welshmen, using a bow and arrow, on market day. The historic practice of chasing Welshmen in the Welsh marches has been the preserve of Herefordians for many centuries.

Dr. Taylor: I thank the hon. Gentleman very much for that intervention. I wonder whether he also knows that the Mercians invaded Wessex and Northumbria and almost took Bamburgh castle. However, we are not campaigning in that sort of way. All that we want, as has been said by so many hon. Members, is absolute fairness across the board, so that the West Mercia police can have the same crack of the whip as other like authorities. I shall not go into the figures; I shall be just a little parochial, as was the hon. Member for Worcester, and mention some improvements that have happened in my local patch.

The 300-officer increase across the area has been of tremendous benefit. Although people still do not see as many police officers around as they would like to, they are beginning to see more than they did. The police are able to enforce an alcohol-free zone, and to do more about antisocial behaviour. However, people still complain to me about the lack of police presence.

The limitation on the way in which the police can tackle the drug problem is alarming. I have driven around the constituency with policemen and they have shown me the light on outside a house that means that the drug dealer is in there and is ready to deal, but they cannot tackle him under those circumstances. The problem of pensions has been mentioned, as has that of custody facilities. I believe that there is one facility in West Mercia—not in my patch—that is full by 2 pm on a Saturday. Call handling is improving, but needs to do so more, and more help is needed to counter antisocial behaviour.

I acknowledge that we get a rural sparsity grant, and reinforce the comments that have been made: we must keep it. West Mercia is a slightly odd selection in that it is largely rural but has some fairly big cities and many moderate-sized market towns. It is a difficult area to police. I do not quite understand the floors and the ceilings, but I take the point that they are essential for us, so they must be kept.

Historically, West Mercia is a low-cost and highly efficient authority, as has been confirmed by Her Majesty's inspectorate. It provides good value for money. It has more than achieved efficiency savings in the past few years; the authority actually put in a restrained precept last year. It is almost another example of an authority being penalised for efficiency and economy. There is also an understandable local feeling that if the economies had not been made and the precept had not been restrained, we probably would not have suffered so much.

To conclude, we must maintain the sparsity grant and the floors. Area cost adjustment should be considered, as it is in so many other instances in which the counties are disadvantaged. I disagree with the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) about community support officers. They are uniformed bodies who are very obvious around the place. As they count as civilian staff, they are a tremendous addition. They certainly do a very good job in my area, and I ask for support for the bid for the extra 40 CSOs.

West Mercia has a very high number of civilian staff, which does release the uniformed officers. I praise it for that. The crucial problem, however, is that the Government grant per head is one of the lowest, so the proportion paid by local taxpayers is much higher than the average. Policing is such an important issue for the Government that I long to hear whether the Minister will address our problems in West Mercia.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): When I was elected in 2001, I calculated that I probably represented one of the least policed areas of the country. At that time, before the increase, West Mercia had the second lowest number of police per head of population in the country. My constituency of 63,000 electors had only 63 police officers, which was about half the average for West Mercia. I am delighted to say that when West Mercia decided two years ago to raise council tax by 33 per cent. in order to recruit an extra 300 officers—a decision that I fully supported—my constituency gained 22 extra officers. That increase of a third was thanks not to Government funding but to a local decision bravely taken by the chief constable and the police authority. I believe that that decision had the support of every Member to whom I have ever spoken, which might put into perspective for the Minister just how far down the scale West Mercia is when it comes to police numbers. London has something like seven times as many police officers per head of population as my constituency does. Admittedly, we are a low-crime area, but we still need policing. Given shift systems and the like, it does not take a genius to work out that not many police officers are on duty in my area at any one time.

As the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) clearly said—I am delighted to congratulate him on securing this very timely debate, and congratulate other Members who have spoken—the basic problem is that the grant for West Mercia is much lower than for almost any other police authority, including the comparators. That is the basic root of the problem. However, several other issues have compounded it, some of which I shall discuss. Of particular concern is the way in which West Mercia ended up being nominated for next year, which caught even the Home Office by surprise.

We have heard that even a standstill for next year might need a 9.8 per cent. council tax rise because of the effects that have been discussed. This would clearly put West Mercia in line to be nominated or capped next year as well, which is of considerable worry. As we have heard, the force needs to address some very important matters, particularly in relation to custody suites, or cells as most of the public call them—"custody suites" is a very modern term. There are no custody suites in my constituency at the moment. The force has had to close them, quite rightly, because of modern requirements for handling prisoners.

If someone is arrested in Ludlow, the nearest custody suite is Shrewsbury. It takes two police officers 50 minutes to drive that person to the custody suite, log them in and do all the necessary work. It takes two officers away for several hours—I have already said how few officers there are in my constituency—just to take an offender to the custody suite. There are plans to install a new custody suite at Leominster in Herefordshire—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin) does not appear to be here. Leominster is just down the A49 and about 10 to 15 minutes from Ludlow, which would make a significant difference to the number of police who can be active in my constituency. They can be back in the area much quicker if they need to make arrests. However, that custody suite is not in next year's funding proposals for a 5.5 per cent. increase and a possible 9.8 per cent. rise in council tax, about which we have heard. Things that are very necessary will not happen as a result.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (LD): As my hon. Friend said earlier, is that not the crux of the matter? The figure cited of between £6.8 million and £7.9 million is below the level for most similar forces, but West Mercia is facing a cut of £517,000 this year, and that happens year after year. Surely the Minister realises that that must end.

Matthew Green: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: West Mercia faces a £517,000 shortfall in what it would have projected to spend next year without allowing for growth.

Peter Bradley: The hon. Gentleman said that his hon. Friend was right. As I understand it, his hon. Friend is not right in claiming that there will be a cut of £500,000 in West Mercia's funding. What the hon. Gentleman described is not what his hon. Friend described.

Matthew Green: It is not a cut in this year's budget. No; it is an enforced holding down of next year's budget. That is what nomination is; in effect, it will result in a cut in what probably would have been spent next year. It is semantics to argue about whether we should call it a cut.

I shall briefly mention some of my concerns about the process for deciding next year's nomination. When the Minister for Local and Regional Government met the police authority to discuss the matter, I understand that one of the factors that he took into account was the fact that complaints had been made about the size of the rise. I believe that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister received one complaint about the size of the rise—from just one person—yet that one complaint seemed significant to the Minister for Local and Regional Government.

There is a problem with the Government's tactics. They announced that there would be potential capping to keep authorities' spending down; then, to ensure that council tax was kept low, the Chancellor gave extra money to local authorities. That money pulled them all down a couple of percentage points. However, the money went only to local councils; it did not go to police authorities. That fact was missed by the ODPM, which went ahead with the capping without realising that it would not help the police authorities—which it clearly cannot do, because it comes from a different funding pot.

I am concerned that exactly the same will happen next year. If West Mercia has to look for a 9.8 per cent. rise in council tax, it will be told that it must be kept down. Ministers from the ODPM have already made it clear that it should be lower this year than last, and I am sure that they will hammer it down. I am also sure that, just before the projected election next year, the Chancellor will hand over some cash to make council tax even lower. I can see it happening; but it will not affect police authorities if it is done then as it was done this year, and the police authorities could find themselves caught out.

I reiterate the plea that we heard earlier about area cost adjustment. I regularly canvass police officers in my constituency who work for West Midlands police. They freely admit that they prefer to live in Shropshire, although some experienced officers later come to work for West Mercia police. Those officers get the area cost adjustment for working in the West Midlands police area while living in the West Mercia area. It is clear that West Mercia should have an area cost adjustment. I hope also that the Minister will keep and increase the sparsity grant, which has not kept pace with inflation since its introduction. It was welcome then, but at best it is now in danger of stagnation. In time, that will further increase the problems for West Mercia.

Finally, we are debating the subject today because of a national political problem over council tax. West Mercia has been nominated for next year, but that is down to the fact that the Government have become very nervous about the level of council tax. Until they get to grips with council tax, scrapping it and replacing it with something fairer that is based on the ability to pay, they will continue to have such problems and to deprive local forces of the ability to take their own decisions. I am sure that every Member backs the idea of local police authorities being able to take decisions for themselves about the number of police and how to pay for them, rather than being brought to heel, so to speak, by Ministers in London who act for national political reasons, without any judgment on the way those local forces are run.

2.50 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (John McWilliam): Order. May I ask the hon. Gentleman to be as brief as he can, because we want to get to the wind-ups?

Mr. Paterson: I shall be extremely brief because many of the points have been made. I congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on landing this debate, which is a matter of great interest to all our constituents, and on having assembled all the Members for Shropshire for the first time since Shropshire Life got us together on the green. I also congratulate him on excluding the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who muscled in on the photograph.

In connection with such matters of great historical note, I remind the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) that one of the kings of Mercia, who was obviously of the soft left, made it policy to chop off the hand of any Welshman caught the wrong side of Offa's dyke. However, his successor, who perhaps came from the middle way, chopped their heads off.

We have heard a lot of figures and the hon. Member for Worcester clearly elucidated the situation. The brutal figure for West Mercia is £92.24 but in the case of North Wales police—at the bottom of the hill where I live—every resident receives £117.48. That is a brutal, simple fact. We are not complaining about the global sum of money, but about the unfairness of the distribution system, which goes back to before the Government came to power, to the advanced ideas of West Mercia about civilianising—a ghastly piece of jargon—which basically meant replacing police officers answering telephones with civilians. Of the 4,000 staff, 2,600 are civilians and 1,400 are officers. West Mercia is being penalised for its advanced thinking from several years ago. Will the Minister look at the situation?

Peter Bradley: The hon. Gentleman made what is, I am sure, an innocent mistake. The police officer complement, as I understand it, is 2,424, not 1,400, although there are 1,602 police staff. Well over 50 per cent. of those employed by West Mercia are actually police officers.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful for that contribution, but the figures I mentioned were those that I jotted down when I went with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff). I am sure that we can sort them out later but, regardless of which figures are right, my point is that West Mercia replaced police officers with civilians early on and is now being penalised because of the way the system has been built.

When I wrote to the Home Secretary, I received a kind response from the Minister of State that contained a paragraph that I should like her to elucidate. The letter said:

> "You say that the West Mercia Constabulary is unfairly funded as their grant per head of population is different to neighbouring forces. We do not distribute funding on this basis. Grant varies between authorities with a range of socio-economic characteristics reflecting a range of relative policing needs. There are no objective grounds to suggest that West Mercia is unfairly funded".

But to anyone paying council tax, £92.24 as compared with £117.48 is unfair. That bears down disproportionately on my poorest constituents, who are the ones who write to me about the global area of council tax. I take a middle way between the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire.

I have had a lot of letters complaining about the global level of council tax, but which do not mention the precept especially, but it is worth pointing out that 300 extra officers were all funded by increases in council tax, and not from central Government. In the next line of the letter the Minister rather gives things away. She states:

> "I recognise that formula changes implemented in 2003–04 did shift resources in favour of more urban areas."

That, bluntly, means that there was a shift by central Government, which did not favour rural areas. The Minister must acknowledge that, so I ask her to reply with reference first to the civilianisation, which went ahead very early in West Mercia, and secondly, to the clear shift of central Government money from rural to urban areas.

I entirely endorse the comments made by the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) on cells. The cells in Market Drayton and Oswestry were closed about five years ago, which caused considerable upset in the area. The people who were put in those cells were, frankly, what one would call low-tech cases. Nearly all of them were people who had had too much to drink. I entirely endorse the practice of taking more dangerous cases off to high-quality custody suites, but it is ridiculous that two policemen should be driving people around Shropshire in a van. In one case someone went from Oswestry to Shrewsbury to Telford and ended up in Worcester, which is nonsensical.

I should like the Minister to examine the health and safety regulations on cells. We have an excellent new chief constable, who is carrying out a review of the matter. I hope that the Minister will give him a helping hand, so that the cells can be reopened for the low-tech cases that I referred to.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing not only the debate but the support of hon. Members representing constituencies in Worcestershire, Shropshire and at least half of Herefordshire, and on achieving a degree of consensus about what is obviously an important local issue. I speak of a degree of consensus because it clearly frayed at the edges with the occasional difference of opinion and some forays into the subject of the heptarchy and its doings, which I am not sure are entirely relevant to the subject of the West Mercia police authority.

What clearly unites hon. Members from the part of England in question is the feeling that they are not being given a fair deal for their police authority, and that they want things to improve. They are right to bring that matter forward today, and I have a sense of déjà vu because I remember all too clearly similar debates about different parts of the country, taking place over years—not least when I was the chairman of a police authority in the era of capping, when there were no increases in police numbers, and when the Home Secretary was the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). We remember, and recognise the difficulties.

Most hon. Members were astonished, after last year's capping announcement, to find that a police authority had apparently been plucked out of the air for the nomination. It is a great shame that there was not a separate debate on the police authorities in the context of the capping debate, because it would have been extremely useful to bring out some of the issues then in a way that the brief statement on local authorities and police authorities did not make possible.

When we study the position of West Mercia police authority, and the fact that it has been nominated, and consider what the hon. Member for Worcester said about the other local authorities in the area which were capped or nominated at the same time, we can draw only two reasonable conclusions. Either the people of West

[Mr. David Heath]

Mercia have collectively lost the use of their critical faculties with respect to their local authority members, or somehow the formula is wrong. Some hon. Members may doubt it, but I suspect that the latter is the case.

When I consider policing authorities across the country, I notice that we are also asked to believe that every police authority—they are not usually the most profligate authorities or the most cavalier in their use of public resources—has apparently in the past year taken leave of its senses and incorporated a substantial council tax increase. Indeed, the average increase for all 43 authorities was 11.7 per cent. We must either believe that police authorities as a class have taken leave of their senses, or that there may be something wrong with the Government formula for distributing grant and providing for local authorities. I think that the latter is the case.

I am not speaking as an advocate for West Mercia—my responsibilities lie elsewhere—but I have looked at the way in which it spends its money. Is it spending appropriately? Yes, as far as I can see. Is it using its resources well? Yes, as far as I can see, and as far as Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, the Audit Commission and everyone else who has investigated can see. Is it spending, empirically, a high amount on policing? No, it is not. The fact that it is not is transparent from the figures that we have all been given. Is it following the Government's intentions? Yes it is: it is employing the extra police officers whom the Government boast of having employed. If one looks at the Government paper, "Policing: building safer communities together", one can see the Minister smiling on the front page and boasting about the real achievements that continue to be made, such as the fact that the number of police officers has risen to an historic high. That is true, and I congratulate the Government on that, but she cannot will that end and not will the means by which to support it, which is what West Mercia has done by increasing its precept to pay for extra police officers.

If one looks at the figures for West Mercia—I have just done some back-of-the-envelope calculations based on those figures—one can see that the spending per head on policing is instructive, because it has risen substantially over the seven years of Labour Administration: it has gone from £92.30 to £133.31. That is an increase of just over £41, or about 42 per cent. That is great. That is doing the job that the Government were elected to do, and which they promised to do. However, the Government spending for West Mercia over the same period has gone from £76.74 per person to £90.04. That is a rather more miserly increase of £13.30, which is about 17 per cent. The contribution from council tax payers—here is the rub—has gone from £15.56 in 1996–97 to £43.27 last year. That is an increase of £26.71, or 170 per cent. That is the difference: Government spending is up 17 per cent., while council tax payers' contributions are up 170 per cent.—a tenfold percentage increase. That is why people get upset.

I accept what hon. Members around the Chamber have said—that they have had very few letters criticising the police precept, because people generally want their money to be spent on policing. People do not see why they should spend extra money and not get anything to show for it: they are happy to pay to see extra officers on the street, but they are not happy to pay a council tax increase that is out of all proportion to the benefit that they derive from it. I must say that council tax increases often appear to be entirely arbitrary.

There is a deep, dark secret in this place, which is that the three major parties in this House agree to a large extent about what we want to happen with policing. There is a degree of consensus that would, were it to be known outside, entirely ruin the careers of some of our colleagues. We understand what is needed and we want extra police officers. Some hon. Members have reservations about community support officers. As far as I am concerned, they are a useful adjunct to, but not a replacement for, police officers—that is the view that we have always taken. We want to see investment for efficiency. We want police officers to be given tools that keep them on the streets rather than in police stations filling out forms. I think that we all agree on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) and others spoke about custody suites. They are important because if a police officer has to travel to put an arrested person into custody, that is a huge disincentive to making an arrest. When arrests are made, police officers are effectively taken off the streets while they travel to the nearest custody suite, which can be a long way in rural areas.

Peter Bradley: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Will he support the initiative to issue on-the-spot fines that the Government have had under trial? In cases of low-level crime such as those to which the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) referred, such fines would free up custody centres and would mean that time would not be spent conveying people who would otherwise be arrested from the scene of the crime to the custody suite or police station, and then further afield.

Mr. Heath: The answer to that question is yes, but with reservations. We have debated the initiative in statutory instrument Committees, and the Minister knows that I have strong reservations about its effectiveness when it comes to children over 10. We still need to see evidence that it is effective in reducing recidivism. Only if it does that is it effective. If a fine by means of a fixed penalty notice, rather than an arrest, does not deter someone from committing crime again, we must rethink. However, that obviously has a value in reducing police time. We are clear about that.

Matthew Green: The point about on-the-spot fines, though, is that many of the people arrested and in custody suites on Friday and Saturday nights are drunk and disorderly, and they cannot be given an on-the-spot fine and be left on the streets to continue to be drunk and disorderly. One whole point of the police action is to take them away and put them in a cell, if only to recover from the state into which they have got themselves. Such offences are clearly not suitable for on-the-spot fines.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The biggest deterrent to crime is the expectation of being caught, which increases when people know that there are enough police officers to do the job. To have enough police officers, we have to have the budget to pay the police officers. That is the simple arithmetic of the matter.

There will be strains on any police authority budget. We know about the issues of wages and pensions. I was promised by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (David Maclean) when I went to see him in 1996—I remember this well—that by January there would be a solution to the police pensions problem, but that has never happened. It did not happen under the previous Conservative Government and it has not happened under this Government. We still have a huge difficulty with that.

We can have our arguments about our ideas for police reform. I should like to see a bolder move towards a national police force that takes away national functions and leaves chief constables to fight local crime effectively and concentrate on local issues. That is my party's view. I would also have a different system of financing, which might be better or worse. We could have a political debate on that, but it is not today's question. It would be right to have a relationship between local areas and the chief constable, for example through some form of minimum policing contracts—local contracts that provide for a minimum number of police. That is particularly important in rural areas that abut urban areas, where we so often see the rural police officer absorbed into the city environment to fight crime. That happens for perfectly understandable reasons, but the people in rural areas feel that they are deprived of their police cover.

All those are matters for debate, but our real concern today is that the problems are not just in West Mercia, although it has particular characteristics. It is a largely rural force; it does not have a large city; it suffers as a result of the formula; it is outside the area cost adjustment. I must say that I do not agree with simply extending the area cost adjustment to take in another police force area; the problem is the system, not the fact that it does not happen to cover the particular authority in question. More importantly, however, a huge problem is looming next year. We know that a gap is coming, we know what demands there will be on the Home Office's overall budget and we know that, at the moment, it cannot meet the demands of the police service. That is where the Minister needs to focus her attention. How do we close that £350 million gap that the police authorities recognise, without laying off officers—a tragedy at a time when we are finally getting more officers on the streets—or the civilian staff who allow the police officers to do the job for which we pay them? That is the difficulty that the Government face, and I have not yet heard any sort of answer on it. Perhaps we will not hear that until the next Budget.

3.8 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): May I say to the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) how pleasant it is to attend and to listen to this debate? Although I know parts of West Mercia extremely well, I do not do so as a politician. Hearing about individual problems, or a wide problem pulled down to an individual area, is always extraordinarily productive for us in understanding how policies work on the ground. We owe the hon. Member a debt for having secured today's debate.

I shall not be drawn on the issue of the Welsh, save to say that I do not think that such comments are made only in West Mercia. Where my wife's cousins come from in Yorkshire, the rubbish at the bottom of the farmyard is called keltea. When I inquired as to why that was, I was told that the only etymological origin for the word was the rubbish left behind by marauding Celts when they were seen off. I think that the Welsh might have something to complain about in that respect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Speaking as the descendant of some of those marauding Celts, I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not mean me.

Mr. Grieve: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thought that my comment would probably provoke a response. I shall rapidly move on to the substance of my comments.

Today's debate has highlighted the similarities between the problems of West Mercia and those of Thames Valley, which is the area that I represent. The clear connections between them identify a difference that the Government will need to deal with. West Mercia was set up in 1967 in exactly the same way as Thames Valley was set up. The areas were rural in the way that our grandfathers would have understood the term: deep countryside, market towns, county towns and very little else. Since that time, the population and infrastructure in areas such as West Mercia and Thames Valley have developed proportionately far more than in other areas of Britain, but, historically, expenditure on policing, particularly on police numbers, has not kept pace with that level of development.

The hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members have identified particular complaints. The area that I represent, which is on the edge of London but not within London—without London or Birmingham weighting allowances—has all the things that highlight police areas that have problems. There are difficulties with recruitment and retention. Other police forces are more attractive, and the number of police per head of population is proportionately low. It is no surprise that Dyfed-Powys just over the border from West Mercia has the highest clear-up rate in the country, as it also has the highest rate in England and Wales of police per head of population.

This is not rocket science. The problem that the hon. Gentleman identifies and that I hope the Minister will deal with—it is a non-partisan issue—is how to succeed in moving the civil servants at the Home Office into making police area assessments that are not 25 years behind the times. That is one of the key problems in policing areas such as West Mercia or my own area, Thames Valley.

I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman say that policing had been a success in the past 12 months. It is certainly true that crime rates have been coming down, but the overall position in respect of violent crime in West Mercia since 1998–99 is absolutely horrific, with a rise of 195 per cent. between 1998–99 and 2003–04. The rates may be coming down for the first time, but they are certainly not going down to the levels that existed before 1998–99, or before the Labour Government's election to office in 1997. It seems that that considerable challenge is not being met.

Hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) and for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), have commented on the necessity for fairness in the allocation of money. I agree that the burden of the 300 extra police officers has been put entirely on the precept, and that that is an unsustainable and unattractive prospect. One only has to look at how the council tax police element has been treated since 1996–97 to see an all too familiar pattern of whacking rises, which were interrupted in 2000–01 to 2001–02 by the imminence of a general election, when cash was suddenly made available. The amount spent in those two years went up from £74.06 to only £78.50. That form of stop-go funding is dependent only on the extent to which the Government think that the electorate will punish them. In the long term, such funding is unsustainable. I wait to hear from the Minister how the Government intend to deal with those points.

I conclude with the wider issue, which is whether we have enough police officers to do the job. I believe that the answer is clear from this debate. We do not. If we wish to move towards the forms of neighbourhood policing that have been successful in other countries in achieving reductions in crime, we will have to fund the necessary police officers to do the job.

That is why my party carried out its study two years ago of what was required. It concluded that 40,000 extra police officers in England and Wales were required to achieve proper neighbourhood policing, that CSOs cannot be a substitute for that—even though I am sure they play a useful role—and that, if we want to achieve a reduction in crime, we will have to put the funding in.

That is why we committed ourselves to increasing the police force by 40,000 officers. We intend to carry out that promise. It will take several years to achieve—officers cannot be recruited overnight—but we are deeply committed to the plan, because it is the only way in which the electorate in West Mercia, or anywhere else, will see a proper benefit from the money that they pay in tax in relation to the police.

That is the challenge. I fear that the Minister will not be able to meet it. The truth of the matter is that the Home Secretary has been carpeted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer over the issue of expenditure on policing. He has failed to persuade the Prime Minister to back him up—indeed, the Prime Minister now seems to be rather supine in the face of the Chancellor. Real savings could be identified in the Home Office by grappling with issues such as immigration and asylum. Until all those things happen, the extra money for the real increase in police numbers that we need will not be available. In the meantime, it is the poor old council tax payer who will be required to pick up a burden that, frankly, going by the figures, is intolerable.

3.16 pm

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I will endeavour to deal with as many points raised by Members as I possibly can. This has been a lively and interesting debate and I want to congratulate, in particular, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on obtaining the debate. I am sure that all of his colleagues would join me in that. I am delighted that, on the whole, Members have concentrated on the particular matter of West Mercia, on which there is a degree of cross-party concern. Later, I might come on to some of the more provocative comments made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), although I will try to restrict myself—tempted as I am—to concentrating on the issues that we are debating.

Like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, I am not that familiar with the West Mercia area, although I had the recent pleasure of attending an extremely good event organised by my hon. Friends the Members for Telford (David Wright) and for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley). We got together to discuss antisocial behaviour with local police officers, the local authority and local residents. I was hugely impressed by the commitment of all parties in that area, not just to tackling antisocial behaviour, but to dealing with residents' fear of crime. Certainly the feedback that I have received is that that is beginning to bear fruit. I am absolutely delighted that antisocial behaviour powers are increasingly being used and I congratulate my hon. Friends on taking the initiative in organising that event.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester has done an excellent job in setting out the police authority's case and he has given us a great deal of factual information. However, I want to confirm to Members that the background to the position in West Mercia is that there has been significant extra investment in policing, both by the Government and indeed locally by council tax payers. The increases in police strength, community support officer numbers and police staff levels all reflect the increasing investment that local people wanted to see to provide more safety and more security in their communities. That is reflected nationally. We now have the largest number of police officers that we have ever had in this country: there are nearly 140,000 police officers, and together with 4,000 community support officers they provide that essential reassurance.

So although there will be issues about particular areas, levels of funding, the distribution of the grant and the way in which it is calculated, I ask all hon. Members to bear it in mind that those issues exist against the background of a significant investment in policing over the past few years. Every Member, as a constituency Member, will begin to notice that their constituents are telling them that, while they still want to see more police officers, they are beginning to see the difference on the ground, in their communities.

Clearly there is much more to be done. I am not for a moment complacent about our record. That is why we had the five-year strategic plan, why we shall issue a White Paper very soon and why we shall issue the next edition of the national policing plan. We shall continue to try to ensure that our police service is as efficient as it can be and that we get the best productivity out of the investment that we make.

I was disappointed by the contribution of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), who appeared simply to cleave to the past and to a traditional way of doing things. I say to him that, if we are to get the best value out of public investment in our public services—including investment in policing—we must be more creative about the way in which those services work. We must use science, technology and civilianisation and we must implement work force modernisation to free up police officers to work on the front line. I was disappointed by his statement, which I would characterise as an old-fashioned view of the world. I ask him to open up his horizons and to be a bit more creative.

Mr. Luff: The Minister has raised a provocative and important point. West Mercia constabulary has been at the forefront of innovation in policing. It was at the forefront of thinking outside the box and being modern and it is now being penalised for its pioneering approach. I am all in favour of being modern, but that must mean selectively modern. Modernity is not good for its own sake.

Ms Blears: I do not for a moment dispute West Mercia's excellent record as an efficient police authority. I was referring to the hon. Gentleman's personal views rather than to the performance of West Mercia, and was making a plea for him to be a bit more open-minded about the way in which public services in this country are conducted.

On the settlement for West Mercia last year, Members will know that we did our best to maximise the amount of police grant that was available. We got £140 million from other Home Office budgets. So we were not terribly popular in the Home Office but we garnered as much as we could for the police general grant because we know that it is a top priority for the public. We then put an extra £100 million from specific grants into the general grant and we decided—exceptionally—that we would have a standard rate of general grant increase of 3.25 per cent.

That decision benefited West Mercia. If we had implemented the funding formula in full, the force would have received a grant of £106.4 million, but because of the floor of 3.25 per cent., it received £107.7 million. It received £1.3 million more because the floor was there. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) referred to the letter that I sent him that showed that we had provided the floors and, therefore, that West Mercia had received slightly more funding than the formula would have given it. Although the formula has been changed and, if it were implemented, would shift resources towards urban areas that have greater needs for policing, so far it has not been implemented because we took the exceptional decision last year to provide the 3.25 per cent. flat-rate settlement that protected West Mercia.

Today I heard a plea that we should continue to have those floors so that West Mercia will be protected in future. We are keen to return to a position where we can have some floors and ceilings, but obviously I understand the plea from authorities that are in a similar position to West Mercia that they should not be unduly penalised as a result of the reintroduction of floors and ceilings.

Clearly, I am not in a position to go into detail today about this year's police settlement. I will make an announcement about that in November, but I hear the strong plea. It was one of the reasons why, last year, we made that flat-rate settlement rather than implementing the funding formula. Members will know that authorities such as my own lost money. Greater Manchester lost £6 million. The West Midlands was £26 million adrift and the Metropolitan police were £54 million adrift. We are concerned that we use the flat-rate increase rather than floors and ceilings. I am sure that hon. Members will understand that other areas have difficulties as well.

This year, West Mercia was nominated on its budget increase. The reasons for that were that we were concerned to ensure that we had reasonable council tax increases. Concern was expressed, particularly by people on fixed incomes, about the level of council tax increases. Therefore, criteria were set around which people would either be nominated or designated on their budgets. We had had some large council tax increases in the preceding years and the measures that we took this year brought down the police precept from about 26 to 28 per cent. in 2003–04 to about 12 per cent. this year. The average total council tax increases were brought down to 5.9 per cent., compared with 12.9 per cent. in 2003–04. There was a need to exert that pressure on council tax, but I entirely understand why the three police authorities that found themselves on the wrong side of the criteria came in and made representations. I was present with my right hon. Friend from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister for Local and Regional Government, to hear them. West Mercia made a good case on the grounds of its efficiency and performance but unfortunately the criteria were set and there were no exceptional reasons to enable us to depart from the decision to nominate its budget in that case.

I cannot go into great detail about the settlement for next year, but we want to bring back the floors and ceilings if we can. We are working hard to maximise the amount we have for policing because we know that it is a top priority for the public. We have considered the information about the costs in the system from the Association of Police Authorities and from the Association of Chief Police Officers. I reject the phrase "police inflation", but I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester about the committed costs for pay, pensions and increments. In drawing up the police settlement we are taking those costs into account as far as we can.

Inevitably, every organisation has fixed costs. I say to every police authority, including West Mercia, that they must consider different ways of carrying out their business in order to get as much productivity as they can out of the investment made so that they can meet their costs. I do not underestimate the challenges to the police authorities in doing that, but inevitably every organisation—public or private—must try to face up to such costs.

Mr. Heath rose—

Ms Blears: I am not going to give way as I have only four minutes in which to address the issues raised.

Hon. Members raised the issue of the rural sparsity grant, and I am happy to confirm that it will remain in its present form for next year and there will be no change to the formula that underpins it. The rural fund will not be increased in line with inflation. The decision was made that, where there are any extra funds, we want to put them into the general police grant that can be spent at the discretion of forces. We are constantly under pressure to give people local discretion, but the main fund will recognise the particular pressures in rural areas.

[Ms Blears]

I am delighted to tell hon. Members that this Government are making progress on police pensions. Unlike previous Governments we issued a consultation document, which came out in December 2003, and we have proposed a system whereby employers' and employees' contributions will go into a fund, pensions will be paid out of it and a central Government top-up will smooth out the volatility in the current system, which has been a real difficulty for police authorities. When there is a spike of people retiring, it is quite difficult to meet those pressures. Police authorities know when people are due to retire, so there should be an element of forward planning, but the system will be much better with a central fund whereby Government take the volatility and uncertainty out of the system. We hope to proceed in that manner. I hope that hon. Members acknowledge that, if achieved, that will be a significant step forward.

My hon. Friends the Members for Worcester, for Telford and for The Wrekin, together with the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), have pressed me on the application for additional CSOs. I am delighted that Members feel CSOs are making a significant contribution. They patrol for 70 per cent. of their time, and that is why they are different from police officers. They are not extracted to go to court and give evidence and they are not taken off to do other jobs; they are there to reassure the public, and that is why they are such a vital part of our police service. The comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire about their not being real police officers or being two-thirds of a police officer are very derogatory. I believe that they provide a good service.

I have heard the pleas of my hon. Friends, and I will be looking closely and carefully at the submission from West Mercia for extra CSOs. I have applications from across the country, but I will bear in mind the points made forcefully by hon. Friends.

I was delighted that the hon. Member for Wyre Forest acknowledged the complexity of floors and ceilings. His contribution was very refreshing. The contributions made about the possibility of shooting Welsh people in Hereford sounded to me like terribly antisocial behaviour, and I have no doubt that steps will be taken with regard to that.

I am delighted to have had the opportunity to respond to all hon. Members' concerns. I see how important policing is to their local communities, and I am glad that they have taken the time and effort to attend and make representations. All I can confirm to them is that I shall bear in mind everything that they have said this afternoon when making decisions about the police settlement, and I am sure that we shall have the pleasure of debating the subject in future.

Woodlands (Article 4 Directives)

3.30 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): I was intrigued by the Minister's comment about Welsh people near the end of her speech. I wonder what comments were made against Welsh people during the previous debate.

It is a privilege to raise an issue that affects not only Wales but parts of England: the sale of woodlands and the use of article 4 directives. The matter was drawn to my attention by two constituents, Mr. Bill Butler and Colonel Brian Ruddy, who attended my surgery in Monmouth a few months ago. Their concern was to protect woodlands in their local area—Catbrook in my constituency—but from the diligent research that they have undertaken it is clear that the campaign that they have successfully started has nationwide implications, which is why I am grateful to have the opportunity to raise the matter.

In 1999, I secured a debate on a similar subject, concerning the sale of large-scale woodlands in Chepstow Park wood in my constituency. Following that debate, there was a successful resolution of that issue. The main aim of my contribution today is to highlight the environmental impact that the subdivision and sale of woodland can have, particularly in areas of outstanding natural beauty, and the selling practices of companies such as Woodland Investment Ltd.

I would like the subdivision and sale of woodlands to be included in the Government's current consultation on the subdivision and sale of agricultural land, and to ensure that the planning process in England and Wales is responsive to the subdivision and sale of woodlands through the use of article 4 directives and sections 84 and 85 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, which gives special protection to areas of outstanding natural beauty.

I hope that guidance similar to that which has been given to local authorities in England—to the credit of the Minister's Department—will be given by the National Assembly for Wales to local authorities in Wales. One my main aims is to urge the Forestry Commission to consider seriously the disposal of forestry and woodland areas and to ensure that they are not sold to companies such as Woodland Investment Ltd., which are likely to subdivide and to sell them off in small plots.

Mr. Bill Butler and Colonel Brian Ruddy drew my attention to a potential threat to local woodlands in Catbrook, a lovely village in the Wye valley area of outstanding natural beauty. Their concern arose from the siting of signs stating "Woodlands for Sale" in what is known locally as Ninewells wood. These signs are commonly found on roadsides throughout England and Wales. I was intrigued by a similar sign that appeared beside the A40 just north of Monmouth relating to woodland known as Hayes Coppice on the border of my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch), with whom I have discussed the matter.

Those "Woodlands for Sale" signs have been erected by Woodland Investment Ltd. It advertises small plots of woodland for sale through the internet. It is believed that potential buyers are urged to own a piece of Britain's beautiful countryside and advised that they can use the wood for a variety of purposes such as holding family reunions or the siting of caravans. In planning terms, those activities would require a change of use from agricultural forestry to recreation. However potential buyers are not informed of that. One of the main purposes of the debate is to highlight the need for a potential change of use, and the directives that local authorities should give in such cases.

The woodlands in Catbrook had been subject to a local dispute. Local residents sought to purchase a 25-acre wood. Unfortunately, they lost out in an auction and the company that bought it subsequently sold it on to Woodland Investment Ltd. The company established a new entrance to the wood and constructed a hard-standing area. The question is whether it needed planning permission to do that. I understand that Monmouthshire county council is deciding whether to take enforcement action. Purple marks on trees were evident and contractors informed local residents that the wood was to be sold off in small plots.I ask the Minister and his advisers to be good enough to look at the website of the company—www.woodlands.co.uk—and to consider whether the advice that it gives requires the Government and the Welsh Assembly to update the planning system, so that it can respond to this new, internet-type sale. We had a public meeting in Catbrook village hall, which was well attended. One of the contributors to that meeting was my predecessor, Mr. Roger Evans, whose expertise in planning law I acknowledge. He had advised us all to ask the local authority, Monmouthshire county council, to apply article 4 directives to save that wood and other woods in my constituency in which similar signs are going up, and which are being advertised for sale on the internet. There are woods in the Cross Ash area and in Hayes Coppice, just north of Monmouth.

On the woodlands.co.uk website, the question is asked,

> "What sort of things can I do with my woodland?"

The answer is quite intriguing:

> "You can walk, climb, make camp fires, study wildlife or work with wood. You can camp there and have family reunions, christenings and bonfire night parties. With your own wood you can do things that aren't possible in 'public woods'".

I wonder what that is a reference to.

> "For many woodland owners there is the satisfaction of owning a small piece of the British countryside and being able to manage it."

I do not think that anybody would question that as an objective. However, it is the non-forestry, non-woodland functions that most concern my constituents.

> "Potential buyers are advised that they are not able to build a house on the woodland—but you can build for forestry purposes".

For example, one could erect

> "a steel shipping container as a shed that could be used if you were to engage in forestry work."

It is said that

> "These are very secure and surprisingly cheap (under £1,000 for 1690 sq feet). This has the advantage that they can be installed quickly and moved within the wood . . . should the planners object to the siting, they can be relocated."

My constituents are rather horrified at the idea that local woods could be subdivided into small plots, with shipping containers located willy-nilly throughout them in case people want to engage in woodland work, with the proviso that they had better move on should the planners try to catch up with them. Another question that is asked is, to which the answer is:

> "Can I park a caravan?"

> "The 28 day planning rule means that you can park a caravan in your wood and use it for 28 days in the year. Many people leave a caravan in their woodland for longer but this can only be done if there are no objections from neighbours. A white caravan in a wood does "shout" so it is sensible to paint caravans in dark green or brown."

Again, that idea causes great concern to my constituents. As well as P and O shipping containers, we are to have caravans painted in brown or green dotted around the woodlands of the Wye valley.

A number of issues arise from the marketing and sales practices of Woodland Investment Ltd. Woodland sites are often subdivided and then given new names, so we see advertised on the website woods that have unrecognisable names. They do not appear on the Ordnance Survey map. They are a creation of the marketing of the company.

The price of woodland sold in sub-plots through the internet is often considerably higher than the price that one might pay at auction. Ninewells wood is being advertised for sale at £4,000 per acre, compared with a maximum auction price of about £2,000. There is also a clear effort to minimise the planning limitations and the permitted development rights associated with using small woodland sites for such activities as family reunions, the parking of caravans and steel containers, and the dangerous practice of having bonfire parties.

There have been serious fires in the Wye valley in recent years and the fire service faces major problems in combating forest fires. When we hear of forest fires, we think it inconceivable that the planning system permitted people to buy small woodlands and to have bonfire night parties. It would be an irresponsible policy to condone. Potential purchasers might also have unrealistic expectations of the viability of harvesting the wood from small sub-plots.

My constituents respect the wish of people to own a bit of woodland to engage in small-scale forestry. However, they are seriously concerned about the sale of woodland for non-forestry purposes. That matter has been stressed to me in correspondence from the Woodland Trust, which encourages people to invest in small woodland sites, but does not accept the principle that they should be used for non-forestry work.

There has been a history in England of the subdivision and sale of agricultural land. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) and the hon. Members for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) and for Wealden (Charles Hendry) have raised the matter in the House. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning issued a written statement on 19 April that acknowledged the problems associated with the subdivision and sale of agricultural land, with the erection of caravans and access to roads, and concern about the buyers of small lots being misled into believing that they could do more with the plot than would normally be allowed under the planning system. The same concerns about the subdivision and sale of agricultural land apply to the subdivision and sale of woodland.

[Mr. Huw Edwards]

The consultation that the Government have undertaken should be extended to cover woodlands. In answer to a written parliamentary question, my right hon. Friend stated that no concern had been expressed about the subdivision and sale of woodland. That is why I submitted to him the letters to Monmouthshire county council and to me from constituents expressing concern about the subdivision and sale of woodland.

We believe that we may have been the first to identify the threat to woodlands as a result of that practice. I fully acknowledge those hon. Members who have identified the threat, especially from a company called Gladwish Land Sales, from the subdivision and sale of agricultural land in England.

According to Mr. Brown, one of my constituents who lives by Ninewells wood:

> "The local environment is rich with wildlife, flora and fauna, some of which are very rare species. The wood is a breeding site for the nightjar—an internationally endangered species . . . the wood should be harvested and then allowed to return to natural ancient woodlands."

He and his neighbours care deeply about the local wood. They hoped to purchase it in order to protect it, but they lost out.

Mrs. Heidi Broughton, the agent of Woodland Investment Ltd., has been particularly offensive to Mr. Brown and his wife. She said that, if they were to cause any more trouble, the company would bring in the travellers. The company has already established a hard-standing area and a gateway to the woods, which we believe was done without planning permission and is contrary to planning regulations. Such threats are highly irresponsible, and I hope that Woodland Investment Ltd. will apologise to my constituents and withdraw the threat unequivocally.

It is essential to stress that the environment will be threatened if local woods are split up. There is a threat to biodiversity from the siting of caravans and the holding of family reunions and bonfire parties. The planning response in England has been to apply article 4 directives. Those relate to article 4 of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995, which gives planning authorities the power to override permitted development rights. Wealden district council has applied article 4 directives. Several sites in the Wealden district council area are within an area of outstanding natural beauty. Charnwood district council in Hertfordshire has also applied article 4 directives. My constituents and I have urged Monmouthshire county council to apply article 4 directives to all the potential sites in Monmouthshire in the Wye valley area of outstanding natural beauty.

The advice given by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to local authorities acknowledges the problems, and states that local authorities should act swiftly and pre-emptively. It gives advice on the measures in the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 to speed up enforcement action following a breach of planning control, and to enable a planning authority to issue a temporary stop notice when a breach of planning control is first identified without having to serve an enforcement notice .

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to talk to his colleagues, the Ministers in the National Assembly for Wales, to ensure that similar guidance is given to local authorities in Wales. Carwyn Jones, the Minister, stated that the position is being monitored in Wales. I hope that one outcome of today's debate is that more pressure will be put on the National Assembly for Wales to recognise the potential threat that those practices pose throughout Wales.

Furthermore, it should be acknowledged that local authorities must be more informed of their duty under sections 84 and 85 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. I had the privilege of serving on the Committee that dealt with that legislation and participated in the debates. That Act requires positive and effective action to be taken by the Government and local authorities to protect areas of outstanding natural beauty. Section 84 states that local planning authorities have the power to > "take all such action as appears to them expedient for the accomplishment of the purpose of conserving and enhancing the natural beauty of the area of outstanding natural beauty or so much of it as is included in their area."

Section 85 requires Ministers of the Crown, public bodies, statutory undertakers and any persons holding public office to

> "have regard to the purpose of conserving and enhancing the natural beauty of the area of outstanding natural beauty."

In the inventory maintained by the Countryside Council for Wales, Ninewells wood is classified as semi-natural ancient woodland. The purpose of the AONB classification is to protect and to enhance the natural beauty and amenity of the Wye valley, including its physical, ecological and cultural landscape, and to promote the quiet, informal enjoyment of the Wye valley by the general public, but only so far as it is consistent with the first objective. I contend that local authorities, including Monmouthshire county council, need to mindful of the overriding duty to protect AONBs.

The Forestry Commission and I have been in correspondence about the matter. It has recently come to light that the commission is intent on disposing of a number of woodlands that do not deliver a significant public benefit. The sale of woodlands in Wales is expected to raise about £1.8 million. I am concerned that the commission could sell to companies such as Woodland Investment Ltd, which may then subdivide those sites and dispose of them separately. I would not have thought that it was within the raison d'être of the Forestry Commission to allow woodlands to be degraded as the result of inappropriate activities on woodland sites. My hon. Friend the Minister and his ministerial colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Welsh National Assembly should consider the implications.

I urge the Minister to consider the main policy objectives that I identified at the outset. They are to consider the environmental impact of the sale and subdivision of woodland, especially in AONBs; and to include the subdivision and sale of woodlands in the Government's consultation on the subdivision and sale of agricultural land. Although woodlands are fundamentally different, there are similarities, but it would take much longer for woodland to recover should there be any degradation as a result of subdivision and sale. The other objective is to ensure that the planning processes in England and Wales are responsive to subdivision, through the use of article 4 directives and sections 84 and 85 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act.

Following my Adjournment debate on the proposed sale of Chepstow Park wood in 1999, Forestry Commission policy was changed, and the wood was saved from development as a holiday village complex. I am grateful to those of my constituents who attended the public meeting, who have written to me on the subject and who are in London today. I am especially grateful to Brian Ruddy and Bill Butler for their diligent research in identifying the implications of the subdivision and sale of woodlands. The issue affects not only my constituency, but has implications for the whole country. I will do the best I can, using the facilities that Parliament gives me, to protect the beautiful woodlands of the Wye valley. I hope that, in his response, the Minister will offer some reassurance.

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) on securing this debate and on putting so succinctly the issues that have arisen in his constituency. As he rightly said, the future protection of our woodlands is relevant not only to his constituency but to the entire country. He has also drawn attention to the sensitivity of woods and forests. His constituents complained about the possible threats to the amenity of woodland. Those threats include shipping containers used for storage and the penetration of woodland by cars and caravans. I take the point that such actions can damage existing trees and the tree root system, and can be intrusive and unsympathetic to the landscape.

I have read very closely the Ninewells conservation group's report on the area to which my hon. Friend referred. I congratulate the chairman and the secretary of that organisation and others involved on presenting an informative document for consideration by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and for today's debate. We recognise the concerns. We rely on vigilant local communities and amenity groups, as well as on local authority and Government agencies, to defend the safety and continuity of our attractive woodland, wherever it is.

My hon. Friend referred to the statement on agricultural land in April by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, in which he said that farmland was being sub-divided into small plots for sale over the internet and explained why that was bad news for the appearance of the countryside, a matter to which I shall refer later.

My hon. Friend has done a great service in raising the profile of this issue. When my right hon. Friend the Minister made his statement, the significance of splitting sites into plots was particularly relevant to agricultural land. At the moment, agricultural land is of more concern in England than woodland. Although the Secretary of State has considered several requests to approve article 4 directives involving woodland, especially in the south-east and the west midlands, the sub-division of woods does not yet appear to be the large-scale problem that it is for former fields and meadows. Having said that, the issues facing planners are the same, regardless of whether farmland or woodland is being sub-divided—a point that my hon. Friend made.

Woodland is a precious rural asset. Its landscape, wildlife and forest products are of benefit to everyone, even where there is no particular public access to a given wooded area. Insensitive and unauthorised activities can lead to an unwelcome change in the appearance of woodland.

Woodland, too, could suffer neglect, especially if plots are bought as a long-term investment in which there is little commercial incentive to maintain the trees properly. The Minister for Housing and Planning spelled that out in his statement when he explained how the appearance of the countryside could change. As with farmland, plot sales of woodland might create fear in those who live nearby that development is inevitable. I certainly picked up on that concern when reading submissions from my hon. Friend's constituents to him and to the county council.

I take this opportunity to outline some of the relevant parts of the law governing the use of forest land and to provide clarification. Hon. Members will be aware that the key concept—the trigger for planning control—is whether something is development. That is the nub of the issue. Some types of activity do not amount to development unless they are so frequent that they have an impact on the local amenity and bring about an unauthorised change of use. The following examples—my hon. Friend referred to some of them—are not usually seen as development: brief events such as a bonfire or an outdoor party, picnics, barbecues, family gatherings, even the parking of a car, do not amount to development. Other activities that are normally deemed to be development and which therefore fall under planning controls include, for example, the erection of buildings, fencing an area and the creation of access roads. However, there is a third category, to which my hon. Friend has alluded. Some development is given a permitted development right—a general planning permission that removes the need to make a planning application.

In the context of woodland, several of those rights could be relevant. The Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 allows for the stationing of caravans, camping, works necessary for the purposes of forestry, and the staging of events on no more than 28 days—in some cases, 14 days—unless the land is a site of special scientific interest. I note that the area to which my hon. Friend refers adjoins the SSSI site of Cleddon Bog. The fact that, although it is not itself a SSSI, it adjoins one, might be relevant to a planning application, but that is a matter for the local authority.

As for shipping containers, bearing in mind what might happen with regard to planning applications and enforcement action, I do not want to speculate about any particular plot sale advertisement and the suggestions made in it. However, a container could be treated as a building for development control purposes. It is a matter for the local planning authority to assess whether development is going on and whether it is lawful. That might involve taking into account other indicators of what is happening on the site.

There are circumstances when placing a caravan on land may change the principal use of the land. For that reason, use of the land for an occupied caravan generally requires planning permission. However, there are exceptions, one of which, under schedule 2 to the order, covers use of land for one or two nights by a person travelling with a caravan, subject to an annual limit of 28 days on the given land. It is not permitted to spend a full 28-day period, but various periods of one or two nights up to a maximum of 28 days are permitted.

As for gates and fences, those can be permitted development. A planning application is not required for the construction or alteration of a gate, fence, wall, or other means of enclosure, provided that it does not exceed 1 m in height, if it is adjacent to a highway used for vehicular traffic. I just wanted to clarify some of the points raised by my hon. Friend.

Any permitted development right can be withdrawn, if there are strong planning grounds, under article 4 of the order. Such directions may be used if there is a significant, specific and credible threat to an important amenity. My hon. Friend is right that we are consulting about changes to make it easier for article 4 directives to be used. We have been in official discussions with Members of the National Assembly for Wales to ensure that there is understanding about this. In addition, temporary stop notices are a provision of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. We have discussed their implementation with Welsh colleagues.

Time defeats me. There are several other relevant aspects, such as areas of outstanding natural beauty. New provisions on planning statements afford greater cover for ancient woodlands. That approach is relevant and it is worth considering. My hon. Friend has strongly highlighted the environmental impact and the woodland issues. We are seriously considering extending consultation on article 4 to woodland, and I thank my hon. Friend for taking the opportunity in this debate to raise such important issues.

Sea Defences (Essex)

4 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate an issue of enormous importance to my constituents, particularly those living in the Maldon district.

Essex has more than 275 miles of sea walls. Perhaps up to one third of those are within my own constituency and a significant part of the rest lie in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), whom I am pleased to see in this debate. Last year, he and I attended the service in Chelmsford cathedral to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the great floods, which resulted in more than 100 deaths in Essex. All of us are very conscious, therefore, of the ever-present threat from the sea.

That threat is increasing for several reasons. Climate change is leading to rising sea levels, the rate of which some estimate at around 30 cm a century. On top of that, the land is sinking at about the same rate, owing to the tilt that results from settling following the retreat of the ice age some 15,000 years ago. Although there may be some disagreement about the precise rate at which that is happening, there is no doubt that the combined effect of those two processes is that the sea level is rising relative to the land in Essex. The Government's estimate of the rate is about 6 mm every year. At the same time, salt-marsh is being steadily eroded, at about 1 per cent. a year. That not only destroys an enormously important natural habitat, but results in the loss of its value in absorbing the wave and tidal energy, thus increasing the pressure elsewhere.

According to a recent parliamentary answer that I obtained, the Environment Agency assessed 86.6 per cent. of the flood defences in Essex as fair or better. However, that figure is deceptive, since it includes fluvial as well as tidal defences. A recent engineer's report that I have seen rated the sea defences at Steeple Wick, Mayland creek and Tollesbury in my constituency as very poor, with a residual life of less than five years. At Mayland and Maylandsea, where there is a significant population, the defences are also rated as poor. Maldon district council has expressed concern about the threat to the Southminster branch railway line, which passes uncomfortably close to the high water mark at Stow creek on the Crouch estuary.

According to parliamentary answers, 63 miles of Essex sea wall—about 23 per cent. of the total—have been raised and improved in the past 20 years. Of that total, however, just 0.62 miles have been improved in the past five years. In 1999, 2000, 2001 and 2003, no improvement took place at all. Instead, there have been a succession of studies: the Roach and Crouch estuary strategy study, which cost £400,000, the Colne and Blackwater estuary strategy study, which cost £400,000, the Stour and Orwell estuary strategy study, which cost £350,000, the Essex coastal habitat management plan, which cost £50,000, and the Essex shoreline management plan, which cost about £250,000.

In April, the Environment Agency published a report entitled "Maintenance of Uneconomic Sea Flood Defences: A Way forward". The report concentrates on Essex, where, it says:

> "the combination of rising sea levels and foreshore erosion, which threatens the sustainability of defences and gives rise to loss of intertidal habitat, together with many uneconomic seawalls mean that action is urgently required."

The report states that

> "the cost of maintenance of many existing defences along stretches of the Essex coast and estuaries exceeds the benefits."

The report therefore proposes to classify each length of sea wall into one of four categories.

For those defences in category 4, the report recommends that the Environment Agency should begin withdrawing maintenance as soon as possible. In those cases, it states that landowners should be informed of the anticipated residual life, the existing standard of defence and the condition of the structures at the earliest opportunity. Landowners will be able to apply to the Environment Agency for permission to maintain defences on their land at their own expense. An alternative is to apply for countryside stewardship intertidal habitat creation payments, but the paper also makes it clear that there is no legal requirement or general provision for compensation to be paid.

At present, we have no firm indication of how much land is affected, but in the Crouch/Roach estuary system, the Environment Agency has estimated it at 389 hectares. It is worth noting that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs consultation document "Making Space for Water", published in July, states that on a national assessment, it is estimated that up to 500,000 hectares of agricultural land are currently behind potentially non-viable flood defences and are therefore candidate areas for restoration and realignment policies.

Although I do not dispute the logic of the Department's approach, it raises an awful lot of questions. Landowners are not convinced of the method used to calculate either the cost of maintaining the defences or the value of the land lost if they are abandoned. The method of economic appraisal undervalues heritage, environment and community assets such as footpaths. The phased introduction of the single farm payment will make the process even more confusing.

There is real suspicion, too, that policy is being driven in large part by the habitats directive, and that greater concern is being paid to the preservation of wildlife habitat than to the preservation of agricultural land for food production or our heritage. It seems extraordinary that there is a raft of protections for a reed bed providing habitat for birds, together with a requirement for the provision of compensatory habitat should it be lost, while a grade I listed building has no legal right to protection nor do its occupants have any entitlement to rehousing in the event of its flooding.

The failure to carry out almost any improvement works to sea defences in the past five years may well be explained in part by the directive requirement that compensatory habitats should be provided. At one time it appeared that even maintenance work would trigger the same requirement, and I should be grateful for the Minister's confirmation that that is not the case.

The priority points-scoring system used by DEFRA to assess projects is also set so that no flood defence scheme in the whole county of Essex qualifies. What is more, it is distorted in favour of fluvial works rather than coastal defence. On the one occasion when it appeared likely that a scheme would score sufficiently, the Government promptly raised the threshold. The position will be made worse by the abolition of the Essex local flood defence committee and its incorporation into a regional committee including Norfolk and Suffolk. That will mean that future decisions will be taken by a body that is more remote and has little knowledge of the particular problems in the county.

The option that causes most controversy—managed realignment—will have a part to play, which most landowners and farmers accept. There have already been a number of small-scale trials of managed retreat in my own constituency: at Northey island, St. Lawrence and Tollesbury. However, the Minister might be aware that a recent proposal to create 170 hectares of wetland at Weymarks in Bradwell had to be withdrawn because of the strength of public opposition. At the very least, therefore, people need to be convinced that the alternative options have been fully considered before managed realignment takes place.

Where landowners choose to maintain the walls themselves, they need to be able to do so easily without having to obtain myriad consents, which drives up costs and leads to lengthy delays. Although in the Maldon district the council has been supportive of landowners and not insisted on planning permission for maintenance work, that is not always the case elsewhere.

We also need to examine more carefully the effect of dredging for aggregates, which may exacerbate the problem. In Holland, there is a moratorium on dredging within 20 km of the coast, whereas here dredging may take place from 5 km out. The effect may well be to accelerate the loss of salt-marsh. Where dredging takes place in ports and harbours, the sediment is usually dumped at sea. It would be relatively easy instead for it to be used to replenish frontages, as happens in Holland. There, more than 9 million cu m of beach recharge takes place each year, compared with just 2 million cu m here.

Where realignment does take place, it needs to be planned and managed, not left to be determined by chance wherever the defences happen to fail. A breach in the wrong place could do more damage than good to the estuary. Nor can we necessarily rely on natural processes to create salt-marsh. In some areas, all that has resulted is an expanse of mudflat, which has done little to mitigate the problem.

We should also recognise that the decision to abandon land that has, until now, been defended carries with it a responsibility to compensate the owners who are affected. Realignment results in public benefit in the form of sustainable defences, creation of habitat and protection of economic assets. Landowners are therefore entitled to payment in recognition of the positive environmental benefits. In "Making Space for Water", the Government suggest that payment might be available through the environmental stewardship agri-environmental scheme, but that is time limited and it may not be sufficient, particularly if entitlement to single farm payment on the land is lost.

It is, of course, right that there should be proper consultation and study before the strategy for maintaining our sea defences is agreed, but that consultation has been going on for long enough. Defences in Essex are deteriorating and there is a real fear that the Government's approach is one of abandonment by stealth. My constituents want action. That means clarity on managed retreat, reasonable compensation where retreat is shown to be appropriate, and prompt and proper expenditure on flood defences that will be retained.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Does the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) have the Minister's permission to speak?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw) indicated assent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has not asked me either, and he should have done so beforehand, but I will call him.

4.11 pm

Mr. Francois: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) for securing the debate and for introducing it so ably.

I, too, recall the cathedral service that my hon. Friend referred to, when the congregation was addressed by county councillor Ray Howard. He spoke movingly of his experience as a boy living on Canvey Island on that fateful night in 1953. It is important for Ministers to appreciate that sea defences and protection against flooding remain emotive issues in Essex to this day. That is evidenced by the presence this afternoon of four Essex Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and for Castle Point (Bob Spink), which includes Canvey Island. In our county, we take these issues seriously. I want to drive that home to the Minister.

Given that, it is a shame that Ministers have decided to abolish our Essex local flood defence committee. The system has operated successfully for many years. It was in no way broken, so it is a shame that the Government have deemed it necessary to fix it. Last year, I led a delegation to see the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment on these matters. That delegation included County Councillor Ray Howard and County Councillor Tracey Chapman, who has specific responsibility for those matters at County hall. We did our best to impress upon the Minister the need to retain our local committee in Essex. While I stress for the record that he gave us no guarantees, we left his office rather hopeful.

Therefore, I am sure that Ministers will understand our collective disappointment at the decision to merge us with Norfolk and Suffolk on these matters. In those places, the issues are, in some respects, somewhat different. I do not believe that that decision was undertaken for any practical reason. I believe that it was taken simply to fit in with the Government's wider regional agenda. Therefore, I deprecate it. I suspect that it will be no more popular in Norfolk and Suffolk than it is in Essex, so I want to take the opportunity to look the Minister in the eye and tell him, respectfully, that I genuinely believe that he and his fellow Ministers have made a mistake.

In the brief time remaining, I want to stress one further point about the maintenance of sea walls, which was touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford. In recent years, there has been considerable confusion about the interplay between the habitats directive and the granting of consent to undertake traditional maintenance work on existing sea walls. It would be pernicious if the Government were to withdraw funding for sea defences in some areas—essentially, leaving it to local farmers—and then so to tie those farmers up in environmental red tape that they were not allowed to maintain the walls, even if they elected to do so at their own expense. Like my hon. Friend, I would be grateful if the Minister clarified the fact that traditional maintenance does not require compensatory habitat to be provided—indeed, that formal planning permission is not required for traditional maintenance to be undertaken in the normal way.

Finally, I stress that in this area there are important environmental issues, which we all recognise, but that safety remains paramount. We in Essex have not forgotten the lessons learned from the great flood of 1953. We are still conscious of the risks. I hope that others, including those in positions of authority, will remain conscious of those risks in all that they decide to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If a Member wishes to make a speech in a half-hour Adjournment debate, he should obtain the permission of the Member who secured the debate and of the Minister before the debate, and he should inform the occupant of the Chair before he rises.

4.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) on securing this debate. I know from the numerous parliamentary questions that he has tabled that he takes a keen interest in this issue and is very active on behalf of his constituents.

I start by apologising on behalf of the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, who usually speaks on flooding issues. He is unable to be here today because he is representing the UK at the conference on the convention on international trade in endangered species.

I will set out some points about the wider context of Government policies before coming to some of the specific issues raised by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford, and by the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois). The Government have provided a major increase in investment in funding for flood defence and flood risk management over recent years, which is set to continue. I think that that increase is recognised across the board. Total Government expenditure will exceed £478 million this year and will rise to over £564 million next year. That is an increase of £252 million a year against the 1997–98 level. However, as the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford said, there will never be enough funding to meet every flood and coastal defence need. We have to spend taxpayers' money in ways that maximise the benefit of our investment. We need to make sure that the Government's provision for flood defence is spent where it is needed most, protecting people and their homes and possessions from the trauma of flooding.

In the face of all the natural, economic and other pressures that we face, including those of climate change, sea-level rise and the sinking of the eastern part of south-east England, the response cannot be automatically to carry on defending every last inch of coastline to the same standard. We need to consider the cost of maintaining existing defences against the benefits that that work provides. Those evaluations must be applied to flooding from rivers and the sea, in Essex and beyond. If the cost of maintenance exceeds the benefits, it is difficult, if not impossible, to justify spending public money on doing that, knowing that there are well justified schemes waiting to be brought forward for many vulnerable communities.

Allowing sea walls to be breached can have significant environmental and conservation benefits. The hon. Member for Rayleigh may not be aware of this, but I originate from Norfolk, which was also traumatised by the terrible floods of 50 years ago, so I am aware of the importance, in the consciousness and memories of the people of East Anglia, of the trauma of that flooding. I think that he would accept that, in some ways, managed retreat can help to avoid catastrophic flooding of the type that occurred then, which we hope not to have to witness again.

Inter-tidal areas in front of defences are coming under increasing pressure as sea levels rise and coastal squeeze takes place. I stress, however, that the policy is to consider the economic justification of maintenance, and that the withdrawal of maintenance by the Environment Agency does not automatically mean that walls will be breached, as landowners might carry on maintaining them.

DEFRA has published a recent policy statement on uneconomic flood defences to assist the agency in preparing its strategic assessment of flood defence needs. It incorporates the classification of existing sea walls into one of four categories: those with a clear economic case for continued maintenance; those that protect internationally designated environmental features from the damaging effect of tidal flooding; those not in the first two categories, for which maintenance is justified on a precautionary basis because the effects of withdrawal are uncertain; and those not in the first three categories. Category 4 walls are likely to protect only agricultural land, or land of little economic or social value.

The Environment Agency will work with English Nature in adopting that structured approach to considering the justification of future maintenance of all coastal sea walls through a comprehensive series of estuary strategies and shoreline management plans. If the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford will allow me to, I promise to write to him, and to the hon. Member for Rayleigh, about some of the details of the points system that he raised.

Essex estuary strategies are in preparation. Coupled with a revised Essex shoreline management plan, they will provide the information and framework necessary for making the best medium to long-term decisions. The full programme of strategy development in Essex is planned to be complete by 2007.

The presumption is that the agency will not continue to maintain category 4 defences and that the withdrawal process should begin as quickly as possible. However, where, as a result of the studies, defences are assigned to category 4, the agency will withdraw maintenance only after full discussion with the landowners affected and will always ensure that sufficient notice is given, so that landowners can consider their options and factor them into future business plans.

Landowners will have the option to maintain the sea walls at their own expense, subject to consent from the Environment Agency. Where the landowner proposes to continue the existing maintenance regime, there are unlikely to be grounds for refusal. Where the landowner decides not to maintain the wall or fails to gain the agency's consent to do so, their options could include applying for agri-environment payments to create inter-tidal habitats, and selling or leasing the property for habitat creation, for example. In many cases, sea walls for which there is no maintenance justification may have a substantial residual life of several years. It will not be a case of the agency refusing maintenance one day, and inundation the next.

We cannot undertake to defend all areas for all time whatever the cost, not least in the face of climate change. The coastline is dynamic and we need to let it move where we can for economic and environmental reasons. This is not a new policy; it is a truth that has been recognised by successive Governments. For example, the 1993 strategy for flood and coastal defence in England and Wales, issued by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and by the Welsh Office, stated:

> "to attempt to protect every inch of coastline from change would not only be uneconomic but would work against the dynamic processes which determine the coastline and could have an adverse effect elsewhere and on the natural environment".

The 1993 strategy also emphasised the need to consider a range of flood management options, including setting back the existing line of defence.

I assure hon. Members that we will take rational and precautionary decisions on future maintenance regimes and that landowners will be able to consider an alternative arrangement if the decision is made to withdraw maintenance. Those principles will be fundamental to our approach.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-two minutes past Four o'clock.

MRSA (Hospitals)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

9.30 am

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (Lab): May I first say how grateful I am that MRSA has been chosen as the subject for discussion today? I welcome the opportunity to open the debate and thank colleagues for participating in it. It is important for me to put on record our sympathy and condolences to people who have been affected by MRSA. The National Audit Office has reported that about 5,000 people a year are killed in hospitals, a fact that is obviously of major concern to politicians, staff and, of course, patients. It is creating a situation in which constituents throughout the country are now worried about even going into hospital, something that we must take on board and change. We can do that only by improving the problem of MRSA in all acute trusts in the United Kingdom.

The NAO's excellent report deals extensively with MRSA. The point of the debate is not to blame particular staff in any part of the UK. We commend staff who are battling each day against MRSA. By staff, I mean not only clinicians and nurses, but cleaning and catering staff who are trying to improve the way in which they work. We can strengthen that effort by saying continually that cleaners, catering workers and porters are every bit as important as the clinicians and nurses. They all form part of an effective staff team in hospitals, a point that we must reinforce.

Furthermore, when we discuss MRSA, there is always an attempt to make political capital from it, something that we must resist today. The problem of MRSA is not down to a Labour Government or a Conservative Government; it is not about politics. It would be a tremendous mistake for people to play a political game with MRSA. It is far too important for that. The only political point that I want to make is that when sisters, matrons and nursing staff are asked what they feel about MRSA, they say that are unhappy about not having control of cleaning staff. Cleaning is a central and crucial issue in the fight against MRSA.

Surveys carried out by the Royal College of Nursing and other organisations have highlighted the fact that they would like control of cleaning to be in the hands of ward sisters and matrons, so that they can determine the level of cleaning and when, where and how it is carried out in conjunction with the cleaning management and its staff. That is a central point. The problem arises because of contractors. Sisters and matrons have no say in the cleaning of wards by contractors, and that is a major mistake. If hospital staff want more cleaning to be carried out, they are told that it cannot be done because it is not in the contract, so they must accept a level of cleaning that they may consider inadequate and poor. We must discuss that issue. I want to see the removal of contractors from hospitals. I want sisters and matrons to have control of the cleaning staff so that they can determine the level of cleaning in a ward or other parts of a hospital. Such practice would not be going against contractors, but would give control to an in-house cleaning team and the nursing and clinical staff who work with it. It is as simple as that.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's remarks with great interest. What would he say to the spokesman at the Department of Health who said this week that there was no correlation between the contracting out of cleaning and the incidence of MRSA?

Mr. Lyons: I am not an expert, so I do not know whether there is a correlation. All I am saying is that, even in those hospitals where there have been improvements, nursing staff are deeply unhappy about the fact that they cannot be involved in the issue of cleaning. We will never overcome the problem in the longer term if we do not deal with cleaning because it is central and everything else depends on it. I am only reflecting the survey evidence from nursing staff who feel strongly about the matter.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): There may or may not be a direct correlation between the contracting-out of services and the lack of proper cleaning in our hospitals, but does my hon. Friend agree that when services are contracted out we bring in people on extremely low wages and with poor conditions? At the end of the day, one gets what one pays for, as I know from my own practical experience.

Mr. Lyons: My hon. Friend is right, and I thank him for that point.

All I am saying is that in a busy ward or intensive care unit nursing staff may feel that extra cleaning is needed from time to time to try to keep on top of any problems, and I commend them for that. However, it is important that the cleaning staff and others are able directly to respond to that request. The last thing that we want is clinicians and nurses making requests that can be denied because of contract arrangements. That is a major mistake.

I want to put on record my thanks to Stephanie Dancer, a microbiologist in Glasgow, for her advice on MRSA when I was preparing for this debate and, above all, for her dedication to the NHS and its staff. She works enthusiastically, day by day, to try to combat MRSA in every possible way.

I shall try to be brief because a number of hon. Members want to contribute and it can only assist us if more people are involved. I have said before that the historical context is simple: MRSA has been around for a long time. It has existed, and increased, under Conservative and Labour Governments. That is a fact of life and there is no political point to be made. I congratulate the NAO and Sir John Bourn on the first-class report that they produced in July. It deals with the matter in a balanced way and encourages best practice where it exists, but tackles the issue of acute trusts and others who are falling down when dealing with MRSA. As I said at the outset, 5,000 lives a year are involved at a cost, according to the NAO, of £1 billion a year to the NHS.

[Mr. Lyons]

Some Members of Parliament have gone on record as saying that this is a major political issue and should be a central debate during the general election. They are playing politics, and it would be better if they looked after the general hospital rather than the prospects at the general election. Such comments are untimely and undermine the fight by staff to try to reverse the trend of MRSA in some of our acute trusts.

One point in the NAO report that I support and commend is that on inspection. The situation in the UK is patchy. There have been major improvements in dealing with MRSA, but some parts of the UK seem to have been unable to reverse the increasing trend of MRSA in their hospitals. We need an independent watchdog to keep the pressure on acute trusts from year to year to ensure not only that they are talking about making improvements but that they are actually making physical improvements, producing results and achieving more than just statistics. People must be able to see that there has been an improvement in their trust. I am sure that we all know the story of our own local trusts and what they are doing and not doing.

I want to concentrate on four issues: hand hygiene, antibiotic prescriptions, hospital cleaning and rapid testing for MRSA in hospitals. In recent years, hand hygiene has become critical for staff in acute trusts and other parts of the health service. It is an issue for everyone: clinicians, including consultants, nursing staff, catering staff, and cleaning and portering staff. No one can be exempt from the need for clean hands when dealing with patients and equipment. It is clear that equipment in hospitals, and wards in particular, carries MRSA, and we need to reinforce that point. Good practice exists in some trusts, but others need to up their game: they need to do more and make major improvements. Basic cleanliness can stop the spread of MRSA. It is not a recommendation; it must be a common obligation on staff. No one is exempt from hand cleaning and hand hygiene, and everyone needs to heed that message.

The NHS is doing a lot of work on hand hygiene; for instance, it is introducing alcohol-based gel dispensers, for which I salute it. Those are working very well, and we need to ensure that they are not just a flash in the pan, but a persistent and consistent part of cleanliness in our wards throughout Britain. The position is best summed up by Mr. James Johnson, the chairman of the British Medical Association, who said that is has become > "socially, morally and ethically unacceptable for doctors not to wash their hands before touching each and every patient."

He continues:

> "Doctors, nurses and other members of NHS staff who have contact with patients must take ownership and responsibility for their own practice".

His words should become a watchword in every trust in the country.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): It is not just medical staff and people from the hospital who come into contact with patients; it is also visitors and relatives. I would be happy if the hon. Gentleman included them in the list of people who need to be careful about hand hygiene.

Mr. Lyons: I thank the hon. Lady for that point. When I was preparing for this debate, a number of MPs came to me and said, "John, it's all very well talking about the staff, but the whole question of patients needs to be addressed, as well." To be fair, the Patients Association is trying to reinforce the message. Whether we like it or not, visitors to hospitals carry MRSA. People go into a ward—I have been in one myself recently—and sit on the bed. There is all sorts of contact that one would think inappropriate in that situation. There is a need not only for discipline among staff, but to ensure that visiting becomes part of the hygiene regime.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): The general public feel that if there is a family member or a friend in hospital, it is their duty to go and visit them, perhaps even if they do not feel 100 per cent. fit themselves. They may carry germs and illnesses into the hospital. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is the wrong kind of environment for such a person to go into?

Extended visiting hours also cause a problem. In my local hospital, people can visit some wards from 2 in the afternoon until 8 in the evening. That sounds fine, but in reality it cuts down on the time available to cleaners to do their job properly in the wards.

Mr. Lyons: My hon. Friend makes a valid and important point that trusts need to recognise. Hopefully they will acknowledge it in the regimes that they are establishing in their hospitals.

I am not an expert on antibiotics and their prescription, but there seems to be growing evidence among professionals and microbiologists that we need to do something about those that are being used to fight MRSA. Some of the antibiotics that we have been using for some time are becoming ineffective as strains of MRSA seem to be getting stronger. A review is needed of the antibiotics that have been used and are being used. We need to ensure that the curriculum for undergraduate training includes something about MRSA and the prescribing of antibiotics to fight it. That would give us a major fillip in our effort to defeat MRSA.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is also a need for even greater public education about antibiotics; that the more a specific antibiotic is used the more likely bacteria are to evolve drug resistance; and that the public need to be educated that antibiotics must be used sparingly if they are to retain their usefulness in circumstances where they can save lives as opposed to merely helping us to recover more quickly from minor ailments?

Mr. Lyons: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. As the professionals say quite readily, the consumption of antibiotics may be driving up the incidence of MRSA in some locations.

Clinicians need specialist training on how best to treat MRSA. If there is best practice in one part of the UK, let us share that knowledge to assist everyone in their approach. We must have a full study of possible new treatments for MRSA. Good creams and lotions have come on to the market, and we must say to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence that we need to fast-track those inventions to ensure that we tackle the problem on all fronts. I hope that that can be done quickly.

It is not only MPs and politicians who worry about antibiotics but specialists, microbiologists and clinicians. Steve Davis, microbiologist and specialist adviser to the Institute of Biomedical Science, has highlighted the problem whereby some antibiotics that have been used in the past are no longer strong enough to defeat MRSA. We must review the entire strategy for recommending and prescribing antibiotics in order to provide not more but better antibiotics, to try to reduce antibiotic use in acute trusts.

Cleaning is a central issue, and we will make no improvements until we deal with it. Evidence from an RCN survey showed that 42 per cent. of the nurses questioned highlighted the use of agency cleaners as a problem, and they also mentioned inadequate cleaning of hospitals. Some 49 per cent. thought that the use of agency cleaners was one cause of the rise of the superbug. We must ensure that we reflect the views of professionals who are on the wards day to day trying to deal with this issue.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend remembers the time, when I was part of the NHS, when the cleaning staff were part of a team and they felt part of a team. When they come in from an agency and are viewed merely as a member of the cleaning staff, they do not feel part of that team. They do not feel the same obligation, and sometimes they do not have the proper materials to do the job as well as they could. I found that when the cleaning and portering staff were part of the whole team, they did a better job. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Lyons: I do; it is important to give staff proper recognition. We all know from our constituencies that if we do not have decent cleaning staff in our schools we face major problems, and it is the same in hospitals. Cleaners need to feel part of the staff, and progress is being made on that , but we must do more so that they feel part of the clinical collective on the ward who are fighting MRSA and helping the patients whom we represent.

This issue is not just about the management of the ward, or the sister and the matron. We must ensure that there are adequate numbers of cleaners, that there is adequate time for cleaning and that there is flexibility in the cleaning team. If a sister, staff nurse or matron thinks that a ward needs a deep clean, she should be able to make that decision along with the clinicians and not be told, "I'm very sorry but that's not in the contract so you can't have it." Health service staff need that flexibility 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 52 weeks a year. There is a serious concern that we get to Friday and think that we can lower our guard on Saturday and Sunday. I am saying the opposite: the standard of cleaning that we have from Monday to Friday is needed over the weekends as well. We need to make sure that we have 365 days a year of best practice in every hospital.

The chief medical officer, Sir Liam Donaldson, said:

> "Tackling MRSA is a top priority. There is no room for complacency. The National Audit Office report makes it clear that some parts of the NHS do better than others in controlling infection."

Of course they do; that is the central thrust of my contribution today. The evidence is good in some areas and patchy in others.

This debate is not about pointing the finger; it is about encouraging some hospitals to become more focused and to match the best practice in others. There are brilliant examples of best practice, where people have been totally focused. This debate is about commending staff, saluting their work and helping patients, but it is also about telling others that they need to be more focused and determined in fighting MRSA so that we have good practice throughout the UK.

We need a better system of identifying MRSA. At present, it takes something like 48 hours for most acute trusts to identify it. It may take even longer if someone is admitted late on a Friday and the hospital has no facility to identify the infection over the weekend. We must change that. We need services to be available every day to clinicians, microbiologists and others involved.

We need to consider capital investment in equipment that can do that work for us. The Chancellor has produced billions of pounds for the health service; we all know that, and give it due recognition. The beauty of the polymerase chain reaction equipment, which can cost £40,000 or £50,000, is that it will give a result on MRSA in an hour, and it would be a valuable investment for any location. People may say that that is expensive. I think that the money is there, but trusts need to prioritise spending and see that that would be a good way of working. Perhaps NICE can look at that and make a recommendation. At the end of the day, the quicker we can identify MRSA, the quicker clinical staff can take decisions about the isolation of the person affected and protect high-dependency and high-risk patients.

I ask Members to use this debate to be constructive about what is happening in our hospitals, but at the same time—and without being overly critical—to say that we need more from hospitals that are not doing enough. As I said at the outset, I commend staff. They are doing an excellent job in some locations, but we need others to be more focused so that we can now build on the improvement that has been achieved and defeat MRSA.

9.53 am

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) on instigating the debate and making a knowledgeable and constructive speech, with almost all of which I am in agreement.

MRSA is not just a serious problem today, but a growing one. The incidence of MRSA has grown rapidly in the past 10 years, and some experts believe that if we do not take action it could double during the next five or 10 years. Obviously we hope that that does not occur. MRSA is clearly a serious and central problem, which will reward investment. It is important to remember that the cost of MRSA to hospitals at the moment is very great. That is not just the cost of treatment; it involves bed occupancy and a cost to patients and patient lives.

Although I do not believe that capital investment is the key to the problem, all the evidence is that investment in MRSA control procedures will save money for the NHS. Some hon. Members will have read the article in the British Medical Journal this July which outlined the experiment in Chelmsford where intensive steps were taken to manage MRSA in particular wards. One interesting thing about that experiment, although it is hard to draw generalised conclusions from it, is that a 17 per cent. increase in the throughput of patients was achieved as a consequence of that control.

What is striking is that the incidence of MRSA is very variable, and that is the main theme of my contribution. The incidence varies widely between countries—we know that this country has a very high incidence, possibly the highest—but it also varies between like-for-like hospitals in the NHS. Indeed, it varies within hospitals. In my local trust, the apparently modern facilities in Maidstone have a high incidence of MRSA, and, curiously, the old-fashioned facilities in Tunbridge Wells have a low incidence.

It is also clear that the incidence of MRSA varies between sectors. For instance, BUPA hospitals report that they have a negligible incidence of MRSA. There are particular reasons for that, and it is clear that they have advantages. However, I am making a point not about private versus public, but about the fact that there is wide variability. That is not the result of scientific or biological factors; it is the result of way in which hospitals are managed.

Many of the factors that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are to do with the approach to cleaning, discipline and the standards of hygiene that run through the hospital organisation. At heart, this is a management issue. From the chief executive downwards—through the consultants, the medical director, the modern matrons and sisters and right down to the cleaners—there must be a set of habits and disciplines and a way of working that are continuously enforced, measured and monitored. People must be rewarded for that way of working and made to feel that they are getting ahead of the problem.

That sort of culture must be created if we are to tackle MRSA. It cannot be done by spraying leaflets and propaganda around the place or by putting up posters. I am not against those things, but they simply are not the solution. I am sceptical about the idea of creating a watchdog or MRSA tsar for hospitals. I honestly believe that that misses the point, which is that the way in which hospitals are managed and operated from top to toe is of central importance.

In the early days of the NHS and pre-NHS—before we had antibiotics—hospitals were obsessive about discipline. One reason for that rather old-fashioned approach, with matrons in starched white uniforms and so on, was precisely that one could not treat hospital-acquired infections with antibiotics. Of course, people have forgotten about that time 50 or 60 years ago, and we cannot go back to that era, but there is a lesson to be learned.

So many of the little things that made up those disciplines have vanished. We can all see that if we walk round a ward. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) mentioned visitor access. On balance, for quality of patient care and comfort, it is an attractive idea that people can visit their relatives at any time of the day or night. However, it is not a practical idea if one wants to regain control of the ward environment. I am not advocating that we go back to strictly limited visitor hours, but sisters, nurses and cleaners clearly say that they need strictly enforced times without visitors so that they can get control of the ward. There must be enough hours when the wards are uncluttered by visitors for the cleaning to be done, for consultants to do their visits, for problems to be cleared up and for patients to be attended to and cleaned.

The sister and nurses on the ward would be able to prepare for visitors' arrival, and visitors absolutely would have to adopt the same disciplines as any doctor or nurse coming on to the ward. There must be hand washing and caution about what they do and do not touch. They must be aware of what they are wearing and their cleanliness when they arrive. Cleanliness must be a total culture. It cannot be something that just one person does. It is not just to do with putting alcohol-based solution around the place. That is a good idea, but it is not enough.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden that if we do not measure the problem, we will not solve it. It is possible to walk into one ward and believe that it is entirely clean, then walk into another ward and think that it is inadequately cleaned, yet find that the latter has a lower rate of MRSA. Cleanliness is not just visual and superficial.

At the moment, far too many of our measures of cleanliness are just that—visual and superficial; for example, the patient environment advisory team inspections, which the Government like to cite as evidence that we have clean hospitals, are basically visual measures and too superficial to measure the incidence of MRSA. That must change because it is clear that those inspections are missing the point. According to the inspections, in 2003 no NHS hospital had a poor cleanliness record, yet we have a continuously rising and internationally high level of MRSA. That cannot be an acceptable measure; it simply shows that we are missing the point and risk reinforcing complacency.

I make the point, which the Minister may want to respond to, that 78.7 per cent. of hospitals were described as having "good" cleanliness records. They do not. That is simply missing the point and it must change. Investment in measuring MRSA incidence and propensity in the wards is required. It means that there must be a more laborious process than simply wandering around and having a look. I recognise that that will be more expensive, but I strongly believe that it will pay off.

I know that we are not meant to be fond of targets in the NHS, but I see no harm in measuring to see whether we are succeeding. That is entirely sensible. For ward sisters to be able to say, "Actually, my ward's done pretty well—last year I had a high level of MRSA and this year a much-reduced one", seems to me entirely reasonable and admirable and a requirement of good ward management.

In that vein, of how to regain control of the ward and how managers can seek to take responsibility, I want to touch on the hon. Gentleman's point about cleaners. I share the view that there is a problem with cleaning contractors in many NHS hospitals. I do not share the view that that cleaners must be employed by the NHS or by those hospitals, but I entirely accept that if cleaning is a subcontracted service, it is more difficult, and requires greater effort, to ensure that cleaners are managed as though they were employees. If sisters are to have control of their ward environment, they must have the capacity to clean.

Cleanliness in wards is not a question of a daily routine that can be prescribed in a contract. It is a function of incidents that happen, responses that must be made when patients arrive, or must be moved, perhaps unexpectedly, and when they have accidents or problems. In hospital life, that happens all the time, so if one is responsible for a ward, having the capacity to clean at one's fingertips is critical. That will only happen if there is sufficient flexibility in the contracts and motivation, good will and a sense of teamwork.

I want to touch on that as well. One of the things that concerns me, not just in the NHS, but in many organisations, is the tendency to regard subcontracted functions as delegated-out functions—in other words to think, "They're no longer things that we own. I'm a ward sister, it is subcontracted and is not mine." With that goes a desire to cut cost, which is understandable, and a reduction in status. I strongly believe that cleaning in hospitals must be regarded as a specialist occupation and that cleaners must be regarded as worthy of as much respect as a hospital consultant or chief executive.

Only when we start treating our people that way, and listening to what they say about the cleaning routine and equipment, will we create an environment in which they feel motivated to deliver a better outcome. Whether or not they work for a contractor, cleaners need to be aware of the problems and to be trained in tackling them. They need to know that they have got measures of performance, and that they are part of the team and welcome to come to work. They may be cleaning the floor, but that is a worthwhile job and they make a decent contribution that the team appreciates. All too often, cleaners do the job only because it is a way of earning a daily crust. That is why things will not work.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman remains unconvinced that subcontracting-out is the problem. Does he share my experience, which is that in hospitals, including those with contractors, the cleaner is part of the team? They build up a relationship with the nurses and doctors and know exactly what their responsibilities are. That does not exist under subcontracted-out services, because in reality there is a different cleaner in each ward every day. People do not take ownership of responsibility.

Mr. Norman: The hon. Gentleman touches on an important point. One of the great problems with cleaners is that it is a low-status job. They are not involved in a team, and there is limited work satisfaction. They do not feel that they are striving towards a goal and achieving things for patients in the way that other people in the hospital are. That means that those who take up the job are often people who have been unable to find employment elsewhere; as soon as they do, they leave. Work satisfaction and morale are extremely low. That is why the system does not work.

I entirely share the view that if cleaners are rotated from ward to ward, they will not derive any satisfaction from their work. However, the issue on which we are touching is whether we can deliver a quality-managed, rewarding role in a subcontracted environment. There are other models—for example, in IT provision and other fields of medicine—in which highly motivated employees operate in a contract framework that allows them to be part of a team. In those models, the contractor is measured not just on whether enough warm bodies turn up every day to clean the floor, but on whether outcomes are delivered, whether there is job satisfaction, and whether the labour turnover is sufficiently low for people to spend enough time in the job learning how to do it.

Mr. Russell Brown: My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) said that he did not want the subject to become a political issue, but sometimes we cross the battleline on these matters. He commented on the status of the job and the high turnover. I fully appreciate that there will be different situations as regards cleaning operators in different parts of the country, but there are many dedicated cleaning staff. I can only highlight my own locality, where there are people who have worked in the service for 15, 20 or 25 years, and who are dedicated to doing a job that is seen by some people as very mundane—almost as a case of putting in the time in return for money. There will be turnover, but many members of staff—the vast majority, I think—are genuinely dedicated.

Mr. Norman: We are in danger of violently agreeing. It is not my intention to be critical of the cleaning staff that we have; quite the contrary. The way forward is to create a workplace environment in which there can be more of the type of staff to which the hon. Gentleman referred: those who are dedicated because they have great satisfaction in coming to work, and because they feel that they are part of the team and are treated as playing a serious, important role in the battle against MRSA. The issue that we are touching on is whether that can be delivered under a subcontracted arrangement. I am not one to take a dogmatic stance on that; it is an open question. All I would say is that it is not impossible, in my experience, to deliver high-quality performance and to involve motivated employees though subcontractors. It is possible, but it can be difficult.

I will move on quickly, because I am aware that I am using a lot of time. It is important to tackle MRSA holistically, right the way through the hospital management system. That includes not just doctors and cleaners, but the nursing environment. One thing that gives me great concern is that sisters no longer feel that they have control of the ward environment, for some of the reasons that we described. They no longer, for instance, control the access for doctors and consultants as they used to; they no longer feel that they have sufficient control of the cleaning environment. They find themselves tied down with far more paperwork and back-office activities and therefore do not have the capacity to play a commanding front-line role for as much of their time as they would like.

When attacking a problem like this in any organisation, it is central to establish the supremacy of the first line manager, who, in the case that we are discussing, would be the sister. The sister must have control of everybody who comes in and out of the ward, and of the disciplines that are applied. That has to be clearly established in the hospital culture.

It is important, too, that we start to think again about the training of some of the nurses. We have moved a lot of nursing training into the classroom and out of the ward environment. There have been steps to try to create a higher status for the nursing profession and for nurses to take up some of the roles previously undertaken by doctors. All those are understandable measures. However, we should never allow the idea that nurses are too important to do the cleaning, which is starting to appear in some parts of NHS hospitals, to become widespread.

At the end of the day, the nurse should be responsible for the whole of patient care, and that includes every aspect of the environment and cleaning. It does not mean that qualified nurses should delegate such activities to unqualified nurses. From anecdotal evidence, it seems that that happens in far too many hospitals today: if cleaning needs to be done or a patient needs cleaning, we look around for an unqualified nurse. Let us remember that we have substantially increased the number of unqualified nurses during the past six or seven years. I think that they make up something like 27 per cent. of the total number, although that figure may have changed.

I urge the Minister to think rapidly about another point touched on by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden: the design of, and access to, washing facilities in hospitals. We are building substantial numbers of new hospitals, and the development of MRSA has important implications for design. One of the reasons why there is not effective hand cleaning today, even in very modern hospitals, is because it is difficult to do. First, the hand-cleaning facilities are out of sight. Secondly, they are 50 or 100 yd away at the other end of the ward. If doctors are moving from patient to patient and visitors come into the ward and there are no visible hand-cleaning facilities, the chances of their missing out on hygiene and hand cleanliness are much greater. It is critical that we should think again about design. If hygiene and hand cleanliness are to be part of the continuous discipline of the ward environment, hand-cleaning, washing and bathroom facilities need to be substantially improved.

The last thing that I want to touch on, although it has not cropped up to date, is bed occupancy levels. If, as we seek to do in the NHS, we run very high bed occupancy levels—for good reasons, for the most part, such as our effort to reduce waiting lists and maintain throughput—the MRSA environment becomes much more difficult to control. Patients are moved from ward to ward to maximise utilisation, and there is a risk of spreading infection as a result. There is not enough time to screen patients as they come into critical wards. When wards ought to be closed down or when extreme cleaning measures ought to be taken, the stress on management to deliver targets—dreaded word—and to accept patients is in conflict with its capacity to take the measures necessary to deal with what appears to be the invisible problem of MRSA, which is unmeasured and lurking behind the scenes.

I do not believe that there need be a direct conflict between bed occupancy levels and the control of MRSA; it is not as simple as saying that occupancy levels should move down from 85 per cent. to 80 per cent. However, I believe that we should again vest control of the ward environment in the sister and in the chief executive of the hospital. It needs to be absolutely clear that the NHS trust, the chief executive, the line management and the sister are responsible for making such clinical judgments. That is why we have to be extremely careful about the type of pressures that we are putting on chief executives and trusts with a target-based performance regime; I have discussed that before with the Secretary of State and others. There is a balance to be struck, and I am not convinced that we have got it right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no control over the time that Members take, but I can say to them that the purpose of these debates is for the Member initiating them to get a full response from the Minister. If hon. Members are brief, I will have time to call them before I start the wind-ups, but if they are not brief we will have to go straight into the wind-ups.

10.15 am

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I will be very brief. I want to make two general points followed by a specific one about an issue that has not been raised.

My first point is that, to a certain extent, the problem of MRSA will get worse regardless of what we do about it. The rise of drug and antibiotic-resistant bacteria is an inexorable fact of life. It is a fact that bacteria are incredibly successful at evolving, and the more we use drugs and antibiotics the more they will evolve resistance to them. We have to try to slow down the rate at which that drug and antibiotic resistance occurs. The clinical guidelines on the way that drugs and antibiotics are used are important and should be adhered to, because sensible use of drugs and antibiotics can slow down the development of resistance and extend their useful life. That is the issue that I was trying to raise earlier. It is a matter of everybody adhering to clinical guidelines, but it is also a matter of educating the public to understand that antibiotics can have a very limited life if we use them irresponsibly.

Secondly, I commend the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) for his remarks about management. In hospitals, a lot of people are collected together who are, by definition, ill. They therefore have limited resistance to infections to which the healthy population would be resistant. That means that hygiene is of prime importance and, to protect patients, there must be clear management structures that maintain a proper hygienic environment within hospitals.

My third point arises out of a specific issue that could affect the hospital in Milton Keynes, and it is that the media must act responsibly. I understand that ITV was planning to broadcast a programme about MRSA on Monday evening in which publicity would be given to MRSA cases in a number of hospitals, including the one in Milton Keynes. The hospital management there drew to ITV's attention the fact that the information on which the programme was based was unfounded: an allegation, for which there was no proof, that there had been a case of MRSA in the Milton Keynes hospital. Moreover, ITV had apparently asked a private firm to go round the hospitals testing their public spaces for the presence of MRSA, and the test that that firm had used was not one of the approved tests; apparently, it cannot distinguish between MRSA and MRSE. Do not ask me to say now, off the top of my head, what the E stands for; suffice it to say that MRSE is a different infection which, although serious, is not as bad as MRSA.

I am pleased that ITV did not go ahead with the programme. I have no idea whether it intends to show it on another date, but I hope that the postponement is evidence that it has acted responsibly, and that when it was drawn to its attention that the information on which its programme was based was inaccurate, it chose to withdraw it. I hope that that is a proper interpretation of its behaviour. If it is, I wish to place on record my appreciation for that part of the media acting responsibly. If my interpretation of ITV's behaviour is wrong, my commendation will be withdrawn. I simply wanted to get that example into the public domain. It shows that the issue is serious and needs to be publicly debated. However, it is incredibly important that the debate is well informed, based on solid facts and does not confuse the public still further.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): The Evening Standard was responsible for similar infiltration, in which a journalist posed as a porter and took swabs in my local hospital—the Royal Surrey County. We did not have the opportunity to check the facts before they went into print. I subsequently asked the Health Protection Agency to look into the claims in the Evening Standard that the hospital was rife with MRSA—that it was on every surface. As of this morning—even now—the agency has not received the MRSA isolates to try to reproduce those tests. This case involves a laboratory, Chemsol, which has done a lot of the testing in hospitals that the Evening Standard has highlighted as being riddled with MRSA. We need accuracy in this matter, because people worry when they go into hospital. We want to know where MRSA is—not where it is not. That is an outstanding problem.

Dr. Starkey: I absolutely concur with that. Responsible media reports are very useful, but the media must not confuse the public about an important issue, many aspects of which have been responsibly explored in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter), I ask him to be brief, because we want to get to the wind-ups.

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I also thank the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) for raising what is always said to be an important debate in this Chamber in terms of trying to achieve clarity. People have worries about the matter and the problem must be addressed, so I thank him for his constructive and informed comments.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the National Audit Office and the figure of 5,000 patients a year. It has said since the report that patchy progress has been made since 2000 in tackling this issue. I took part in a debate in January, after it was announced that Weston general hospital had come out as one of the worst in the country for MRSA cases. In fact, there are complications relating to how figures were arrived at—in Weston in particular—but I have a concern about the matter.

We have a new chief executive of the Weston hospital, and in recent times I have been encouraged by how he has tackled the issue. As many of us are, I am encouraged by the way that various initiatives have been taken to do with the cleaning of hands by doctors and nurses. I hope, and am assured, that they are encouraged to clean their hands after every single contact with patients and others; I am assured that that is happening in Weston.

In Weston, I attended the initial meeting of the patients' environment forum, which is bringing medical staff, patients, housekeepers, cleaners—everybody—round a table together. I was glad to see them sitting round the table talking about the problem and trying to make a combined effort. I have referred to the fact that Weston has had some particularly bad statistics. It also has a population whose age is higher than average. Given that, it is imperative that action is taken to improve standards of cleanliness.

It has sometimes been claimed that problems arise from residential and care homes. According to Mark Gritten, the chief executive of Weston hospital, between April 2003 and April 2004, 15 out of 32 cases of MRSA at the hospital involved people who had been admitted with that condition. According to a recent Government report, more than a third of care homes failed to have strict infection control. Although I know that the majority of homes in Weston are of a high standard, what action is the Minister taking—given that the Government identified this as an issue—to try to get care homes cleaned more satisfactorily?

I want to make a point to the Minister on behalf of Weston general hospital and the trust, which I have made before, but which I feel constrained to make again. We have some real statistics that show that my area is underfunded as against other parts of the country to the tune of £10 million. I shall return to that issue; I hope it will be addressed, because it is having an impact in other respects too. Recently, under the new chief executive, the hospital voted an extra £50,000 to be spent on cleaning services, which is good. But if we had more money, we could spend a little more on what needs to be done, as many people have identified, in terms of cleaning and general issues.

To quote a local source from the hospital—the chief executive—we have a problem, because with underfunding, particularly in Weston, it is difficult to > "try to screen known MRSA patients by using single cubicles, but the increase in the number of affected patients, and the general pressure of emergency admissions on the hospital" is making screening and keeping people to one side very difficult. Perhaps the Minister will reconsider Weston's funding in this respect, because it is having an impact in all sorts of ways.

I welcome the debate but draw my remarks to a conclusion, as we all want to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mrs. Patsy Calton (Cheadle) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) on securing this important debate. I associate myself with his remarks about it being a tragedy for patients, their relatives and staff when an MRSA case comes to light and, unfortunately, leads sometimes to the patient's death.

The hon. Gentleman made some good points about how important everyone in the hospital is—not just the medical staff, but the non-medical staff—and the importance of their working together. I shall return to that in a minute. Although there is perhaps no direct link between the observed cleanliness of a ward and the MRSA cases that occur in it, patients' perceptions are important. Patients who believe that they are going to get better seem to do so more often. When a patient goes into a ward that is untidy and dirty, with dust on surfaces and dirt on the floor, it is likely that that will affect their perception of their getting better. It is important, for patients' perceptions apart from anything else, that the ward is demonstrably clean.

We have not dwelt a great deal on statistics, possibly because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) highlighted, one problem is that they are not massively available on this front—the recording has not been as effective as it might have been. We know that the death toll from hospital-acquired infections is about 5,000 a year, but the National Audit Office estimates that there may be as many as an additional 15,000 cases per year where hospital-acquired infections are a contributory cause of death. However, they are not properly recorded, so we do not know.

The NAO estimates the cost of hospital-acquired infections to be £1 billion per year, so anything we can do to reduce that amount means that there is quite a prize to be won, not just in terms of patients getting better more quickly, but in terms of the health service saving the money that it has to spend on those infected patients.

Some 9 per cent. of patients have a hospital-acquired infection, which is a horrendous statistic. I make no party political point on that because it has been the case for a number of years, and it requires investigation. Although it is common to quote that it is less of a problem in other countries, statistically, it is not much different there, and any difference could be accounted for by variations in accounting methods. It is not helpful to bandy about the idea that this is a British disease.

Dr. Murrison: I must correct the hon. Lady. Although rates of hospital-acquired infection are more or less uniform across Europe, the chances of catching MRSA certainly are not. There is a 40 times greater chance of getting MRSA in the UK than in Holland, for example.

Mrs. Calton: I am well aware that, where MRSA is concerned, there are variations within hospitals, across the country and in different countries. We do not know enough about that, or about why there are such variations across different countries, within our country and within wards. However, I was talking about hospital-acquired infections generally, and MRSA is part of that wider spectrum.

The Public Health Laboratory Service said in 1999 that patients stayed in hospital 2.9 times longer if they had a hospital-acquired infection: they stayed an average of 14 days, at a cost of £3,000 per patient. That cost will be higher now. A person with a hospital-acquired infection is seven times more likely to die in hospital than someone without one. Those are important facts and estimates on which we need more information, and more collecting of information.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam asked some time ago, in a parliamentary question, about MRSA research studies that were then still to report. I shall be interested to obtain any information that the Minister can give us on the studies that should have reported by now. For example, it was reported on 6 October 2003 that the study entitled "Faster Testing for MRSA: Models to Estimate the Cost-effectiveness of Faster Testing of Cases Admitted for Hip and Knee Replacement" would report by November 2004. It would be useful if the Minister gave us an update on some of the information that she gave earlier.

I agree with many of the points made by the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman), but I take exception to his view that cleaning is necessarily a low-status job and I want to dissociate myself and my party—

Mr. Norman: I just want to clarify that my point was not that cleaning is necessarily a low-status job, but that it should not be. Cleaning is as much a specialist and critical part of the control of the ward environment as any other role there. In fact, I specifically said that we must get to a stage at which we take cleaners and their contribution as seriously as we do that of consultants, nurses and the chief executive of the hospital.

Mrs. Calton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification. I hope therefore that he will not again use the term "enough warm bodies". That is a somewhat derogatory remark to make about anyone working in the health service.

The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, though, to say that this problem is a matter for everyone working in the health service, and for patients as well. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) made the point that he was pleased to see at his hospital medical and non-medical staff, patients and visitors all working together via a patients forum to try to reach a solution. He is right about that, and I am pleased to say that my hospital, Stepping Hill, is similarly taking notice of patients forum responses.

I support the points made by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), who asked for greater responsibility from the media. Some reporting of MRSA that has taken place will undoubtedly create fear in the minds of quite a few patients and leave them afraid to go to hospital. I have even felt that it is best to stay away if it is possible at times. The prospect of going into hospital when the headlines are screaming MRSA is a concern in the minds of patients who are immune-depressed. Those headlines are often based on faulty science or a woeful lack of information. The matter must be publicly debated, and I support the debates in this House, but scaremongering is not useful.

We need more information about the impact of cleaning methods in hospitals. Since we know that hands are the most important vector of infection and of MRSA in particular, anything that they touch must be clean. We know that dust can carry infection. We have concerns about cleaning contracts, the wages paid to cleaners and the contracts associated with private finance initiative and public private partnership methods of building new hospitals. All those must be looked at—we must ask whether they produce more hand contact with infection. Unfortunately, I think that in some cases they do. I visited a hospital recently where the beds seemed to be very close to each other, and that concerned me greatly, particularly as they were in a renal unit.

The issue of more than 85 per cent. occupancy must be examined as well. Is 85 per cent. the optimum point beyond which we can go no further? It would be useful to know what research has been done on that.

We know that hand washing is the most important activity for cutting cross-infection. In my constituency, bedside-mounted and staff-carried alcohol gel dispensers are being installed at Stepping Hill hospital, which already has a low incidence of infection. That is not a gimmick; it is useful. Views from the patients forum have been sent to the clinicians and a week-long awareness raising campaign is forthcoming.

I do not think that anyone has mentioned that elective surgery patients can be separated from trauma patients. That seems to be producing good results in many hospitals. We need more single rooms in order to isolate people, and that seems to be a deficiency in some hospitals. In the South Manchester University Hospitals NHS Trust, which is also used by my constituents, an integrated care pathway for MRSA has reduced cross-infection. We should examine all good practice to see whether it can be spread throughout the country.

The Royal College of Pathologists is concerned at the lack of training in microbiology in medical schools and training establishments. I would be grateful to the Minister if she addressed that issue.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) on bringing this debate to Westminster Hall. It is an important issue. Before the party conference recess, we debated the similar issue of hospital-acquired infections during an Opposition-day debate. There is a great deal of commonality between MRSA and hospital-acquired infections; indeed, the one cannot really be considered without the other.

I recall on 8 September when we debated hospital-acquired infections that the Minister was keen to draw attention to the fact that this is a non-partisan issue. We celebrated that during the debate, but the Secretary of State subsequently abandoned the refreshing attempts at consensus and claimed that MRSA rates increased substantially while the Leader of the Opposition was a member of the Cabinet over a decade ago. The Secretary of State neglected to point out that rates of MRSA infection have doubled since 1997. I mention that only to get the partisan part of the debate off my chest. In the spirit of this debate and of Westminster Hall, I will resist the temptation to score points during the rest of my remarks, which I will keep brief given that the Minister has many points to answer.

We must get away from the blame culture—we have touched on that at some length today—but equally we must be clear about what the evidence suggests. In the context of contract cleaning, it is important to state for the record that there is little evidence that there is a correlation between contracting out of cleaning and the incidence of MRSA. There may be some good common-sense reasons—my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) touched on some—for supposing that contracted-out cleaning might not be as good as in-house cleaning, but we need at least to acknowledge the evidence that exists. I am afraid that this area, more than any other, is susceptible to political manipulation, and we must avoid that.

I echo the points made by hon. Members about the importance of the cleaning staff. I know that, as a politician, it is always extremely easy to say that kind of thing, but it is genuinely the case. I speak from some experience. My first job as an NHS employee was as a hospital porter some 25 years ago, so I understand the importance of ancillary staff in the national health service. I hope that, as we try to work out how to deal with this problem in the NHS, Ministers will give further thought to how ancillary staff can be made to feel a better part of the hospital team. At the moment, ancillary staff sometimes do not feel that way.

I hope that the Minister will recall a constituent of mine called Mrs. Burton, whose story I raised during the Opposition-day debate on 8 September. Mrs. Burton trained to be a nurse many years ago and unfortunately recently had occasion to be admitted to hospital as a patient. When she came out, she wrote me a very good letter in which she laid out 20 points covering things that she thought might be improved in the NHS, particularly in relation to the management of wards, to address the problem of hospital-acquired infection and MRSA. It was a very considered letter. I did send it to the Minister and I would be grateful if, when she replies, she said when I will receive a reply to those points. We are facing a real problem in the NHS in respect of MRSA and the Minister ought to be grateful for any help that she can get at this juncture. Mrs. Burton's remarks were valuable in that respect.

Although many of the points raised by my constituent might seem not particularly trendy or a little old-fashioned, many of those who are involved in the sector feel that we might need to look at old-fashioned notions of cleanliness and asepsis. I was interested to see an editorial in the British Medical Journal last month that essentially said exactly that. It was authored by a professor of infection control from the Netherlands, a country that has a very low rate of MRSA—although I should say, in response to the remarks by the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton), that it has a hospital-acquired infection rate that pretty well mirrors our own. We need to be a little careful about confusing one with the other.

The professor concerned stated that we must have some

"faith in the strength of common sense."

By that, I think that he meant that sometimes in this area it is difficult to get material that is high up the evidence hierarchy to persuade us to act in one way or another to tackle the range of conditions, but we must apply what appears to be common sense. In that respect, the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells were particularly valuable. Sometimes, there will not be strong evidence for acting in one way or another and we must apply what appears to be common sense in management terms.

The Leader of the Opposition called MRSA "the British disease". I think that he probably meant that it was an NHS disease, because the instances of MRSA are a lot higher in the NHS. In private hospitals, it is less of a problem, or less of a declared problem—perhaps there is a subtle difference between the two.

Dr. Starkey: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that he is not comparing like with like? NHS hospitals have a much higher percentage of chronically ill patients than private hospitals and one needs to take into account the susceptibility of the patients to the infection as well as the prevalence of the infection.

Dr. Murrison: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. I am not being judgmental; I am just stating a fact. We must compare like with like. It might be useful to compare orthopaedic cases in the private sector and in the NHS. The same applies to other case mixes. We need to learn why that is. Given that throughput in the private sector is comparable with that in the NHS, we cannot blame the fact that the NHS sees more patients. We must learn about the problem wherever we can.

We must also compare large hospitals with small hospitals. It seems that MRSA is far less of a problem in community hospitals than in larger ones. Above all, we must consider why we seem to be doing so badly in resolving the problem of MRSA in this country compared with other European countries.

The National Audit Office said that the cost to the NHS is £1 billion, but the true cost is far higher in terms of patient suffering and problems for staff. It should be no surprise to any of us here that it is a real problem for staff morale. Trust in NHS staff has taken a major hit. We all receive letters about MRSA and the question of trust has arisen in my mailbag. We are at a sorry pass when the Government exhort patients to ask nursing staff if they have washed their hands. I am unhappy about that because washing hands should be part of the culture of the NHS and I welcome measures to introduce basic hygiene into the clinical curricula.

I said on 8 September—it is worth repeating in the context of MRSA—that during my medical training no attention at all was paid to hand washing or hygiene of any sort. It was perhaps dismissed as being not sufficiently academic to be introduced into a medical curriculum. It jolly well is and I hope that the Minister will do everything she can to ensure that hygiene is an integral part of the curriculum for everyone who trains for a post in the NHS.

I shall rattle through the remainder of my speech briefly. There is some unfinished business from 8 September to which the Minister may now be in a position to respond. First, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) asked about the rapid review of innovative products and the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), said that his Department was considering six of them. I wrote to clarify which ones and to ask for a progress report, but I have received none. Perhaps the Minister can help me with that.

Secondly, I asked how many times senior nursing staff have been able to exercise the powers that Ministers have apparently given them to withhold payment to contractors and departments that have not cleaned to a satisfactory standard. Again, I have received no answer. Finally, the Government's then recently announced target of a tub of hand cleanser for every bed by April 2005 implied that it was good enough to wait nine months, but I asked whether that could be speeded up. Again, I would be grateful if the Minister gave a progress report on that.

I have said enough. The Minister has many points to respond to and I would be grateful if she did so.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) on securing this debate on an important subject and I welcome him back from the summer recess. It is a pleasure to see him looking so well.

Hospital-acquired infections, including MRSA, are a financial burden on the NHS, but, more importantly, as a number of hon. Members have said, they affect patients by causing illness, pain, anxiety, longer stays in hospital and sometimes death. We are therefore facing up to the challenges that they present. Such infections are a problem not only for the NHS, but for health services everywhere, as a number of hon. Members noted. In the United States, Australasia and most European countries, including ours, the percentage of patients who experience a hospital-acquired infection ranges between 4 per cent. and 10 per cent. That proportion is remarkably consistent.

Unfortunately, as a number of hon. Members commented, not all hospital-acquired infections are preventable. Many factors contribute to the problem. As my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said, more susceptible patients, such as those with severe and chronic diseases, are being treated than ever before. At the same time, advances in treatment that improve patient survival rates, such as chemotherapy, can leave patients much more vulnerable to infections. However, although there is no simple solution to this complex and multi-faceted problem, it is generally accepted that up to 30 per cent. of cases of infection could be avoided with the better application of existing knowledge and good practice.

MRSA has become a greater problem in the UK for a number of interrelated reasons, including the simple fact that the strains responsible for most of the infections in the UK are particularly well adapted to spreading between patients. Although the causes of MRSA are many and complex, we believe that the risk of contracting MRSA and other health care-associated infections can be reduced by simple and effective infection-control measures. We know that more needs to be done but, as the NAO report acknowledges, our work has moved infection control up the NHS agenda, so that it is now a top priority.

I shall deal briefly with the political aspects. Like the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), I am delighted about the tone in which this debate and the previous debate in the House have been conducted. The problem will not be solved by party political rhetoric, and I am deeply grateful to hon. Members for generally resisting the political. However, perhaps they will forgive me if in response to the hon. Gentleman's comments, I say simply that if his leader will not listen to the rest of us, he should listen to his hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) and recognise that we have published data on hospital-acquired infection rates and there is no doubt that the imperative under the Conservative Government to take the cheapest competitive tender did not help the situation in the early days, or that the lack of investment has not helped the health service.

Dr. Murrison: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: I have got very little time, but I will give way once to the hon. Gentleman on this point.

Dr. Murrison: I am very grateful to the Minister for giving way. There may be some truth in what she says, but the number of MRSA cases continues to climb; it went up by 4 per cent. last year, which is a significant increase. It is therefore a bit disingenuous of her to blame Conservative regimes for the problem.

Miss Johnson: I was only making the point that we either have done or are doing a lot of the things that have been suggested and that the genesis of the problem lies much further back in time. In that genesis we see issues such as getting the cheapest cleaning rather than seeking to achieve value for money and maintaining standards.

I was interested in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West about the responsibility of the media. It is important that all of us, including the media, conduct the debate in the best possible way. Otherwise, as a number of hon. Members said, we will increase patients' anxiety about going into hospital. The hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton) pointed out how sad it would be if that were to happen, because the vast majority of patients are far better off receiving their treatment than worrying about infection rates.

Turning to the scale of the problem, our best data on MRSA are drawn from surveillance of bloodstream infections, which have shown a slight, but not dramatic, increase—about 5 per cent.—in the past three years. I have with me a list, extracted from the published data, which shows that infection rates are currently falling in a number of trusts. We want to continue that success and build on it so that every trust is in that category, which is why there is now a target for all trusts to reduce infection rates. That can only help. In addition all the actions suggested in the documents "Winning Ways" and "Towards cleaner hospitals and lower rates of infection" are now being pursued. That will begin to have an impact.

It has been suggested that collecting data from every ward might be advantageous. I counsel against that because of the different patient mixes in wards and the different issues and ward environments. In addition, it might lead to great anxiety on the part of patients in some areas, and perhaps to over-reassurance for staff and patients in others.

I am not going to go through the situations in other countries, because that subject was substantially aired in the previous debate in the House. However, a couple of Members have mentioned the built environment and PFI schemes. I agree with the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells in that respect—indeed, I agree largely with a lot of what he said. Getting the built environment right is crucial. Since 1997, our guidance on major hospital redevelopments has aimed for a minimum of 50 per cent. of bedrooms to be single bedrooms. As the plans progress, we should be better placed to achieve the same low infection levels as in the best examples abroad, which might partly be due to building structures, although I agree that there are other issues such as where basins and hand cleaning provisions are located. All indications are that investment in buildings will bring about a big change. Single-bedroom provision in the major PFI projects is running at 35 per cent. to 40 per cent.—sometimes even 50 per cent. Change is taking place.

In July, we announced a new year-on-year MRSA reduction target to show the priority that we give the problem. Having a target also ensures that the issue is given priority in the NHS. I must briefly address the question whether targets in some way militate against solving the problem. A number of trusts that have falling rates of MRSA have hit all their targets. There is no straightforward correlation, and I counsel hon. Members against stating any such correlation: the figures show that no such correlation has been proved. Targets have improved access to treatment and shortened waiting times. We are confident that the new target will help in improving infection control.

As Members have said, hand hygiene is very important. In September, we launched the first ever national hand hygiene campaign. I agree that just having a campaign is not sufficient, but we are taking a phased approach. Good preparation is important to the introduction of such measures. The National Patient Safety Agency is driving that forward.

The provision of alcohol rubs has been mentioned. That is being rolled out over the next year, but that is not to say that we are not trying to bring it forward. Some Members have already highlighted the fact that such provision already exists in a number of places; it depends on the circumstances, on what provision there was before, and on how quickly people have been able to institute it. At the end of the day, such provision may not be possible for every single bed. For example, it is not always feasible in children's wards. However, handrubs will be required at all staff-patient contact points and a number of hospitals are driving that forward in the most positive way.

Many hon. Members asked about cleanliness and the role of ward sisters and matrons. We have already said clearly, and I reiterate, that it is important that matrons and ward sisters are in control. They should have sufficient control over cleaning staff to make sure that they are able to maintain and have oversight of the wards. Under the new "Agenda for Change" pay system, the minimum wage in the NHS will be the national minimum wage plus 84p. That will help to make sure that cleaners are paid more than the minimum rate for other cleaning jobs. I agree strongly with hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friends, who made points about the significance of including cleaners in the ward team. Increasingly, all such people will be under the control of matrons and hospital staff, with the flexibility to deal with issues if they arise. Better, renewed contracts will strengthen provision.

Concerns have been voiced about the training of microbiologists. The inspector of microbiology and infection control is discussing the training curriculum with the royal colleges to improve course content on infection control. That is the right avenue to take.

We have made sure that all the right measures are in place to start to tackle the problem. I agree that the problem is one of culture and that it needs to be tackled in the most fundamental way by hospitals, but they have the incentives and resources to do so and are able to give it priority.

Compulsory Demolition

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): This is my first experience of speaking in this excellent adjunct, and of addressing this excellent Minister, and I am grateful on both counts.

I have come largely to talk about a pub. In part, its plight is symbolic of many other such places in the city of Birmingham and my constituency of Erdington, although it is an actual, specific pub. It is what one great American writer might have called a personal pub—not that I personally have ever been in it. It is now an ex-pub, and, several years after its demise, it is causing serious problems. The Minister is not responsible for this pub or, as far as I am aware, for any pubs; he is not that kind of Minister. Nor is he directly responsible for the continued, ugly, dangerous, and pointless existence of the benighted building in question. However, he is responsible for the law and its attendant regulations that have allowed the situation to occur. I shall sketch out the problem that has led me to trouble the Chamber and the Minister today, before going on to the more widely applicable matter of what I would like him to do about it.

On Six Ways island—Britain's first, and one of Birmingham's best known, traffic islands—which might be thought of as the entrance to Erdington's high street, sits the former Queen's Head public house. That is an inauspicious eventuality. It is the burnt-out shell of a former pub, enclosed in a metal sheath to keep children away from the vermin, vagabonds and structural hazards within.

During the several years in which it has lain derelict, the site has twice been the playground of arsonists, who have started very serious fires. That prompts me to wonder when anything has ever been "secured" from idle-handed youngsters by having a fence put around it. A derelict building—fence or no fence—is a lethal challenge to every kid in the neighbourhood. Yet the enforcement order served on the site in 2001 required only that the site be made "secure", which, apparently, means a fence. As I say, I believe—as does everybody else in Erdington—that the only way to "secure" such a site is to knock it down. The travellers who were on the site prior to the order may have moved on, but does that make the site secure? No.

As I understand it, the Housing Act 1985 provides demolition provision for properties that are unfit for residential accommodation, but when does a non-residential property become such an intolerable part of a community that it, too, must be demolished? The Town and Country Planning Act 1990 does not seem to provide a satisfactory answer.

The site is neither secure nor safe; those two terms seem, but ought not, to be the only criteria that can compel demolition. Can it be true that the law provides no avenue for demolition on grounds of commercial regeneration or social aesthetics? If no one will knock down this monstrosity—let us be clear, it will have to be knocked down in the end; it is a filthy, pointless, burnt-out shell—the only questions are how many more than the five years already it will be left standing hideously until they do, and whether the next time it is burned down there will be a gang of kids or rough sleepers inside.

This is a ridiculous situation. The area around the site is having hundreds of thousands of pounds of taxpayers' money spent on regeneration. Graffiti and posters are being removed from the high street, and we have plans to pedestrianise more of that street. There is a new village green. Shoplifting and street crime have been massively cut by new CCTV, and so on. Those projects involve high levels of community participation and partnership with local groups, yet the Erdington town centre partnership reports that new private sector investment is being discouraged by the visual blight that is this long-derelict building. Erdington residents association has described it as > "in appalling condition; an eyesore which people first see when they enter Erdington from Birmingham city centre. It has been derelict for . . . years and the Fire Brigade has described it as dangerous—after all it has been attacked by arsonists twice. Rats have been seen on the site, as has evidence of drug taking. Once it's flattened it will be better for everyone."

I know that the Minister cannot comment on individual cases. This is a matter for the city council. However, it would kind of like to see it knocked down too. In a letter to me this week, the district planning officer said:

> "We consider that since tidying-up measures would be sufficient to secure a reasonable appearance, specifying demolition only could well prompt an appeal, indeed a possibly successful appeal, further delaying the aim of achieving a visually-better site. We have decided therefore, and subject to final legal agreement, that a notice specifying tidying-up or demolition is the best way forward—the site owner can choose which suits him, and a delaying appeal will be much less likely. The site will either be tidied, or the buildings demolished, both options to the benefit of the locality. In any event, I will continue to informally encourage demolition at the earliest opportunity."

That is marvellous.

I come to the several issues that the Minister can put right, which we might call the parameters of action provided to local authorities by central Government: laws that are made in this place and guidance that comes from the Government. First, the council says:

> "tidying-up measures would be sufficient to secure a reasonable appearance".

That is nonsense. Nobody in Erdington believes it. The only thing that will secure a reasonable appearance for the Queen's Head is knocking it down. Councils do not come to such conclusions autonomously. They have legislation and guidance that tightly prescribes the parameters of their opinions. If their conclusions are wrong, discounting, as I do, the almost inconceivable eventualities of incompetence or ill will on their part, the parameters that they were set must be wrong. That is a matter for the Minister.

It is also wrong if requiring this monstrosity to be demolished

> "could well prompt an appeal, indeed a possibly successful appeal".

That is also a matter of planning law and, therefore, for the Minister. Furthermore, it is clear that in cases such as these there is considerable confusion as to what constitutes danger. That is puzzling to me; danger is such a straightforward concept. If one is in a burning building that should have been knocked down years ago and it is falling on one's head, that is clearly dangerous. I know what dangerous means and I hope that the Minister might encourage moves towards redrafting the legislation or the guidance, such that that unfortunate ambiguity is ironed out.

For the district planning officer to believe that requiring straightforward demolition under a section 215 notice of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 would make a successful appeal more likely is simply not good enough. The council needs better powers to require such buildings, which are inevitably going to be demolished anyway, to be demolished in reasonable time. Indeed, the council should have an obligation so to require, and to do so well before the five years that we have been waiting for somebody to do something about the Queen's Head.

I say nothing of arrogant and irresponsible landlords. I do not ask the Minister to legislate on this occasion for good corporate citizenship. I ask only that he give appropriate powers to local authorities to take control where bad landlords cannot be bothered.

What precisely does Erdington want from the Minister? Flicking through a recent Hansard—as I do—I came across a few words of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) that expressed my feelings perfectly. He said:

> "I have not come here to find out what the law is. The courts determine what the law is; lawyers will tell us what the law is. I have come here, and brought the Minister here, to do what only a Minister and a politician can do—discuss not what the law is, but what the law ought to be and, if it ought to be different, what he proposes to do to change it."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 15 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 466WH.]

The hon. Gentleman was talking merely about the defence of the realm and the practice of medicine. They are simple matters compared with my subject today, which is planning. Planning is a legal minefield and not one on which I propose to dance a meretricious minuet with the Minister. I have no interest, and nor do my constituents, in trading subsections, appendices and special provisions.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): Locally elected councillors sit on planning committees and the time has now come for those committees to be given proper powers to deal with places that are complete eyesores in our communities. They should be able to hold proper committee meetings on that basis and be able to deal rapidly with such issues.

Mr. Simon: I am grateful to my excellent next-door neighbour for his timely and wise intervention. We want to bring to the attention of the Minister and his Department a problem that is serious, chronic, potentially lethal, pointless and emblematic of a wider problem throughout the city of Birmingham and, for all I know, other cities. I was about to say similar cities, but obviously there are no cities comparable with Birmingham. I refer to the problem of when big, old pubs on corner plots have outlived their licensed usefulness, are continually being redeveloped and often lie dormant or derelict for—in the case under discussion—far too many years. The council has insufficient power or insufficient statutory obligation to compel demolition in such circumstances as I have outlined. Either way, that is a matter for the Minister, and we in Erdington would like him to sort it out for us.

Paul Clark (Gillingham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) on raising such an important issue. Far be it from me to imply that there is another city like Birmingham—I understand that as a constituency Member of Parliament—although the issue that he raises is how best to deal with something that is of course faced by other authorities too.

From my reading of the reports about the site that my hon. Friend has provided to the Department and the report that was printed in the Birmingham Evening Mail, I can well understand the frustration that is felt by him and the local residents about the eyesore, as he puts it, on their doorstep in the shape of the Queen's Head public house and about the period over which the issue has run.

Let me at the outset point out that the Government are committed to tackling dereliction and to retaining land in productive use. That is a key part of our drive to maintain and improve the quality of the built environment, as much as it is important to have a sustainable development strategy. My hon. Friend will recognise the importance of retaining land and bringing it back into use, as it fits 100 per cent. into the sustainable community strategy that the Government are pursuing, and eases pressure on other possible greenfield sites and the countryside further afield. That is the baseline where we start.

My hon. Friend is right that we do not have direct responsibility for public houses. Our approach to planning is not to interfere day by day with the powers of local, democratically elected planning authorities. It is for them to make the best decisions for their local communities. They are on the ground and are best able to take such action. My hon. Friend is right, however, that we have a responsibility to create a legislative environment in which local planning authorities undertake their planning responsibilities, and I want to cover some of those issues and provisions.

Section 215 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 provides a local authority with the ability to require buildings and land to be cleaned up when their condition is adversely affecting the amenity of an area. When the condition of a particular plot of land or a building seems to be having a negative effect on an area, the authority can serve notice requiring the owner to remedy the situation. Such notices are often referred to as untidy site notices or section 215s.

My hon. Friend will recognise—I am not talking about specific sites—that there could be one owner or a collection of owners and, because the sites are in private ownership, a number of issues are immediately raised and further steps have to be taken responsibly by the local authority in using the planning controls at its disposal and the legal system. We must make sure that it is right; that is only fair under the law.

The powers under section 215 have been effectively used to make derelict buildings look occupied while keeping them secure from acts of vandalism, incidents such as those at the Queen's Head to which my hon. Friend referred, and antisocial behaviour. In fact, in several local authorities, an owner required to undertake external works has gone further and redeveloped the site or the building, to bring it back into proper use, rather than just securing it from health and safety and other points of view. We have also given powers to local authorities under section 219: If a landowner does not remedy what is listed in a section 215 order, the local authority can do so by default and recharge the landowner. Those powers have also been used.

I said at the outset that it is not for us to dictate day to day; it is for us to provide the framework. Part of that framework is planning legislation, such as section 215, and part is guidance to local authorities on how that can be used. In the past there has certainly been resistance to using some of the powers available to local authorities because of worry about costs being levied against them. That particularly applies to the default powers. That is why, in 1998, we issued guidance in circular 02/98, which is still relevant, on practical measures that can be taken to tackle dereliction. It contains positive measures to help prevent and tidy up derelict sites and to encourage local planning authorities to use their default powers.

I will come in a moment, as far as I can, to the case of Birmingham and the specific site to which my hon. Friend referred. It is for the local authority to decide whether a section 215 notice under the provisions would be appropriate in a particular case. It would have to take account of local circumstances and would need to consider, for example, the condition of the site, the impact on the surrounding area and the scope of its powers. A section 215 notice can be a stand-alone process or carried out in partnership with other agencies that might be relevant to a particular site or combination of sites. That is alongside proactive measures such as empty homes strategies, developments briefs and public-private funding programmes. Those are all development control tools that can be used by a local authority.

Before the end of the year, we will take that further by issuing a good practice guide on the use of section 215. We have already consulted with stakeholder organisations on the contents, and the final version will be circulated before the end of December to all local planning authorities. We recognise that many local authorities have successfully used 215s to deal with the type of problems to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Simon: I am conscious that the Minister may go on to say all kinds of things that I do not know about yet, but could he keep in mind that, although I take his points about section 215, we want the pub knocked down? The site is no more likely to be rebuilt or put back together than Stonehenge. It is only a matter of time before the building is demolished. I am concerned by the impression I have formed that the local authority has neither the power nor the statutory obligation to compel demolition rather than tidying up.

Paul Clark: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I am bearing in mind what he would like to happen. I know that his endeavours on the issue with Birmingham city council and others have been great. He read out a letter that he received from the planning officer, which indicates that there is some movement towards what he wants. Action is being taken—rightly so—by local government, which best knows the site's potential or where we can go with it. When I say "we", I am talking about the local authority, the local planning authority and the strategic authority, along with the private landowners who hold that patch of land. All those factors have to come together, and, because of variations on any given site, it is difficult for straightforward requirements to be laid down at a national level. I shall explain a bit more as I come now to deal with the Birmingham city council case.

My hon. Friend is aware that a section 215 was issued in September 2002. Birmingham city council took that decision on the public house. Unfortunately, the section 215 was issued on the previous owner of that site. At the time of its being issued, there was a change in ownership. One can immediately see one of the hurdles of dealing with privately owned sites through the system. The local planning authority is preparing a new section 215. I know that my hon. Friend has been heavily involved with it through his work as a constituency MP. It is intended to cover not just the public house but the whole site, which also contains several other former industrial or commercial buildings that are equally derelict. Birmingham city council has taken the decision that it is important to cover the whole site.

My hon. Friend is keen to see in the new 215 a 100 per cent. requirement—no holds barred—for demolition of the building. The information that I received from the council and the letter that he recently received from the planning officer indicate that the authority is considering a provision in the 215 for remedial action or demolition. Clearly, that has come about because of the work of my hon. Friend, local people and organisations such as the Erdington residents association.

There is always a danger that any decision will be challenged through the courts, and I know that my hon. Friend will want to ensure that whatever is put in place now through the system has a lasting effect and is not delayed further by great court cases. Therefore—learning from the best practice of other authorities and using existing powers and guidance provided by the Department on their use—it is sensible that Birmingham city council gets it right and we get a lasting solution for his residents. He is right to say demolition controls are about whether dwellings—houses or flats—are unfit for habitation. I suspect that he knows why legislation was introduced specifically on housing and homes for people: we want to eradicate any instance of someone living in an unfit home. He is right that that is where the Housing Act 1985 leads us.

The use of compulsory purchase orders is also open to local authorities, which enable them compulsorily to purchase a site, but although the Government believe that those are important tools for local authorities as a means of assembling land, we expect CPOs to be used as a last resort, and most local authorities do so. Nevertheless, compulsory purchase is another tool for a local authority to consider using. CPO powers cannot be used in isolation; the local authority must be using other powers—requiring that the land be redeveloped for housing, for example, under the 1985 Act. The land must be acquired for a purpose.

We have sought to make CPO powers easier for local authorities to use. My hon. Friend will no doubt recall the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, which contains, in part 8, a series of measures to reform the compulsory purchase system, and they will be brought into effect at the end of this month. For example, the Act amends the power of local authorities, joint planning boards and the national parks authorities, and allows them compulsorily to acquire land if they think that it will "facilitate the carrying out of development, redevelopment or improvement on or in relation to land which is likely to contribute to the promotion or improvement of the economic, social . . . or environmental" benefit to

"their area."

I quote that specifically so that it is clear. I reiterate, however, that the Secretary of State would normally expect any statutory procedures intended to remedy derelict or unsightly land, such as section 215s, to be followed through first and foremost and exhausted before CPOs are considered. In addition, the new Act introduces a "well-being" power—well-being for the given area—which helps to make an argument, although we would still expect there to be a clear proposal for the use of the land under a CPO.

My hon. Friend will be aware of the highway improvements that are required under the bus showcase standard. That affects part of the land about which we are talking and is part of the opportunity to secure a sustainable change of use. Again, it is for the local authority, together with landholders and other interested parties, to become involved in finding out how to take forward a given site to make a lasting change that benefits everyone, particularly the residents in the area. I noted that my hon. Friend said that there is a lot going on around the area—CCTV cameras, a new village green and getting money into existing communities through various programmes.

I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that the Government are keen that a remedy for such sites is found as quickly and as fairly as possible, because they are important to the sustainable communities programme, which this Government have been developing and taking forward. I know that through the hard work of my hon. Friend and neighbouring colleagues, they will ensure the best result through Birmingham city council.

Hospice Movement

2 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I begin with a quote, Mr. McDonald.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. That was not even close. My title is Mr. Deputy Speaker, but my name is McWilliam.

Bob Spink: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The quote is as follows:

> "Our visits to Little Haven give us relief from some of the pressures we have to face all the time. It is very difficult to have a normal family life.
> Looking after Betty is extremely demanding, but we want to spend as much time with her as we can. She is so precious and we don't know how long she will be with us."

The quote is from one of the families who use Little Haven hospice in my constituency.

I wish to start by thanking Mr. Speaker for kindly selecting the hospice movement as the subject of our discussion. This is a very important debate and I thank sincerely all hon. Members who have taken the trouble to come along to the Chamber this afternoon. I shall focus on the children's hospice movement. I shall be as brief as I can—about 10 to 15 minutes, depending on interventions—because there are so many hon. Members present who are much more eloquent and expert than me in such matters and they deserve to have time to speak.

I wish to thank Andy Smith, chief executive of Little Haven, who has contributed greatly to what I have to say. Indeed, I thank all who are involved in the hospice movement: those concerned with medical matters, domestic matters, management matters, voluntary support and, of course, the fundraisers. I hope that my family never need their help but, if they do, I know that the hospice movement will be there for them.

Funding is one of the key issues in the hospice movement. Children's hospices receive 5 per cent. statutory funding. Little Haven in my constituency receives 1.9 per cent. funding from statutory sources, leaving almost all the funding it needs having to be collected from the voluntary sector. Thankfully, we have a wonderful voluntary support sector locally and excellent campaigning local newspapers whose editors, Martin McNeill and Steve Neale, do all they can. We receive support from local businesses such as BP and the three Conservative clubs in my constituency. The Hadleigh, Canvey Island and Benfleet Conservative clubs raise money for the hospice virtually every year. We receive support from the schools; the whole community mucks in to do what it can to support such a wonderful movement.

The fact is that hospices need 40 per cent. statutory core funding. I wish to refer briefly to the special case of motor neurone disease. We have a wonderful MND association in south Essex with great people. People with MND need palliative care to maximise the time and quality of the time that they have left. Readily available high-quality services can significantly improve people's quality of life, but many people who are diagnosed with MND will, of course, live long, fulfilled and happy lives, giving joy to themselves and those around them. Sadly, however, half those people will die within 14 months, so it is important that palliative care is available early in the process to those who have this particular disease.

Access to palliative care is generally low and varies depending on diagnosis, with priority given to people with cancer. That brings me to Marie Curie Cancer Care. It is a wonderful organisation and I pay tribute to everyone connected with it. Marie Curie provides specialist palliative care for about 24,000 people a year in the United Kingdom. The organisation runs 10 hospices in the UK, but perhaps it is best known for its 2,500 Marie Curie nurses who provide care for people in their homes.

About two thirds of people would prefer to die at home. About a quarter of people would prefer to die in a hospice and fewer than one in 20 would prefer to die in a hospital. However, most people die in hospitals, although this is clearly a matter in which personal choice should rule the day, whenever possible. Marie Curie helps to give that choice, and God bless it for that.

In July 2004, the Health Committee published a report on palliative care whose two key recommendations were on funding and access. Access is patchy at best and works against those in less affluent areas. Both Marie Curie Cancer Care and the Motor Neurone Disease Association believe that access should be available to everyone who needs it regardless of diagnosis or postcode; currently, it is not. I know that the Minister is a very good lady, and that she is listening carefully and will address these points.

Little Haven in Castle Point is one of 35 children's hospice services in the UK. They help children with life-limiting conditions, as well as the families of those children. In the UK, there are 15,000 to 20,000 children with such conditions, most of whom will not live to adulthood. The daily toll of caring for a child with a life-limiting condition needing 24/7 care places a huge emotional, physical and financial strain on the whole family.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman refers to the fact that there are 35 children's hospices in the UK—one of which is the Rainbows children's hospice in Loughborough in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), who is my neighbour. In the points that the hon. Gentleman is about to make, will he press the Minister to take a closer look at what the Government say about funding? They say it is the responsibility of PCTs to negotiate agreements, but the number of PCTs, as well as the fact that children's hospices are so specialist and their catchment area so large, makes that proposition unviable. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that?

Bob Spink: I do. The hon. Gentleman is a great campaigner for the hospice movement—he supports his local hospice tremendously well—and he has anticipated my words. I hope he will listen carefully to what I have to say.

The daily toll of caring for children with life-limiting conditions is heavy, as care can be required 24 hours a day, seven days a week, sometimes for many years. That places a huge strain on the family. Life expectancy can vary from just a few months to a number of years, and the health of the child often deteriorates gradually, making them increasingly dependent on the parents and carers. The needs of such children are met in many settings, including the children's hospices, which play a key role, in partnership with other agencies, in helping to meet those complex needs and to support the whole family.

I wonder what images spring to mind when the words "children's hospice" are spoken. Perhaps they are images of unhappiness and despondency—indeed, at times there is great sadness—but children's hospices are focused on enjoying life to the full while it is there, and the children and their families experience much fun and laughter in them. They know that they are not alone. Children's hospices welcome families for a break together in a friendly and homely environment; they allow them time to be a family and to enjoy the life of their child while they can. This is a time when the burden of being the principal carers is lifted.

Children's hospices also help children and families in their own home; that is important. They offer information, practical assistance and advice. They provide a 24-hour telephone support helpline, as well as expert emergency and palliative care and advice, and they frequently make home visits. They also provide end-of-life care and, after the death of a child, bereavement support. That care meets the physical, emotional, social and spiritual needs of individual children and their families.

Children's hospices help in a way that the national health service cannot. They bring together a range of care and advice to support the whole family throughout all the stages of the child's illness, keeping children and families right at the centre of that process. The need for these services is beyond doubt. Another family that use Little Haven said:

> "The support we get from the staff at the hospice is incredible, Jono is really well looked after and we meet other families in similar situations we can relate to."

Children's hospices also benefit our local communities, bringing them together with a common goal of helping others in need. A children's hospice can cost anywhere between £3 million and £4 million to build and have £1.5 million annual running costs thereafter. Almost all that money is raised in the local community. That takes unprecedented commitment and dedication.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. Last Friday, I was fortunate enough to bring a group of children from the Rainbows hospice to visit No. 10, which emphasises his point about the need for a wider social aspect to this issue.

I assume that the hon. Gentleman will, quite rightly, come on to the financing of children's hospices. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) has mentioned the PCTs, but will the hon. Gentleman concentrate some of his energies on the role of social services? Social services from across the region often use the services of such hospices, particularly those of the Rainbows hospice. They know that they should pay, but get away with not paying because the fundraising is so good. Will he insist that social services departments pay their way?

Bob Spink: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention and for all the work that he does in his constituency to help families with children with life-limiting conditions. That is much appreciated. I shall be addressing the Treasury rules that come into play in 2006, which state that any work done in the charitable sector that should have been undertaken by the statutory sector, or that displaces work that the statutory sector would otherwise have to do, should be reimbursed by the statutory sector. The hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity to make that point, and I thank him for that.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): May I say that no Opposition Member raises their constituents' interests as consistently well as the hon. Gentleman? On funding, will he pay attention to the cross-border issues that afflict constituencies such as mine, which sits in the east midlands but naturally looks to Yorkshire, including to the Bluebell Wood children's hospice in Sheffield, for hospice places for our children?

Bob Spink: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. This is one of those debates at which the House excels. A number of people who work very hard for the hospice movement, all of whom care deeply for their constituents and put party politics aside, are making contributions. I will probably use that as my final comment before finishing my speech.

I was talking about the involvement of the whole community in raising funds. Little could get me out of my bed on a cold, wet Sunday morning to run 26 and a quarter miles, but my local hospice movement did, and I was proud to take part. I recommend it to other Members. Almost all the money for children's hospices is raised in the local community, which takes tremendous dedication.

It would have been easy for me to try to score cheap political points on funding, but I will not do that. In fact, I warmly congratulate the Government and thank them for the extra funding that they are putting into the health service; I will not mention the application of such funds at this point. On average, children's hospices receive only 5 per cent. of their funding from statutory sources. I urge the Government to work in partnership with children's hospices, as they do with adult hospices, to develop a mechanism to fund a service that the state would have to provide if children's hospices were not there. That point was raised by the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) a moment ago.

The same principle that applies to adult hospices should apply to children's hospices. Unfortunately, it does not; the same dialogue is not taking place with children's hospices, which is a glaring anomaly. I ask the Minister to address that point today or to write to me about the matter as soon as possible.

The Government should include the children's hospice service in their funding discussions with the adult hospice sector. The national service framework for children and young people could prove to be a powerful agent in helping to achieve the necessary change.

[Bob Spink]

Although children's palliative care is a thin slice of the section on disabled children, the NSF offers a key stepping stone towards developing such services. The Government now need to ensure that the PCTs are assessing the need for children's palliative care in their locality and meeting the full cost of providing that care. That should form part of the monitoring of the NSF. I would be grateful if the Minister confirmed that that will be the case and told us how it will be achieved.

The New Opportunities Fund, now the Big Lottery Fund, has helped Little Haven and many other children's hospices. We are all deeply grateful for that, but the money runs out in March 2006. The funding has become an important mainstay of children's hospices in terms of meeting their running costs, and when that disappears in 2006, the funding situation will become very fragile.

The Government have described how children's hospices should negotiate with PCTs for statutory funding; I hope that the Minister will not dwell too long on that, as we have all heard that argument. Because of the absence of any central guidance from the Government to PCTs, the arrangement results in unacceptable uncertainty for the hospices. Children's hospices have to deal with up to 15 PCTs in any one area. That means 15 rounds of negotiations and 15 very variable possible outcomes. That is not good enough, as it consumes valuable hospice resources.

We need the Government to focus on that and to ensure that the process is streamlined and clarified for everyone's sake. Children's hospices are not looking for an easy life; they simply want a fair deal, practical help and support in finding their way through the funding maze, so that they can concentrate on what they were set up to do.

The Minister is a good Minister. I said that before, and I really mean it. She knows that, as a society, we need hospices. I hope she accepts that and will do what she can to support them in terms of funding and access.

David Taylor: A Minister under the Conservative Administration, the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Virginia Bottomley), stated:

> "The Government's objective is to work towards a position in which the contribution from public funds available to voluntary hospices and similar organisations matches that of voluntary giving."—[Official Report, 15 December 1989; Vol. 163, c. 847W.]

I hope that this Government pick up that objective and run with it. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Bob Spink: I am delighted with that intervention, because it gives me the opportunity to say that there is no better man in the House when it comes to fighting for the health service and for constituents than my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who is on the Front Bench. He will explain Conservative policy on the matter.

When thinking about hospice care, it is all too easy to become distracted by age groups, buildings and disease types, but a hospice is not just a building. It is a service for adults and children, providing, for instance, care at home—a total service. There are many important differences between children's and adults' hospices, but they share the same vision of caring for people at their time of greatest need. Help the Hospices and the Association of Children's Hospices have called on the Government to appoint a Minister for palliative care. That Minister's role would be not only to join up policy on palliative care for children and adults, but to co-ordinate a cross-departmental cross-sector strategy to support people coping with death.

We all value our hospices. They are a jewel in the health service crown.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman, as other hon. Members have, on securing this debate.

The hon. Gentleman referred to cross-departmental responsibilities. Is not one of the key issues for hospices the amount that VAT takes out of their budgets? Is it not time that the Government made all children's and adults' hospices exempt from VAT?

Bob Spink: The hon. Lady makes a fair point, and one that I intended to address, although I failed to do so. I am grateful to her. No doubt the Minister will deal with the matter.

We know that hospices are very important. As a hospice user put it:

> "We know that while we are at the hospice we are in safe and knowledgeable hands—and so do our families".

Let us work together in Parliament, cross-party, to get this right.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Many Members are trying to catch my eye. If speeches are brief, I can get everyone in; if they are lengthy, I cannot.

2.19 pm

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on securing this debate. He has an excellent record of speaking on behalf of the vulnerable in society, and he did so just a moment ago.

Palliative care has long been the poor relation in terms of publicity and funding in the NHS. As we are now aware, more people will be living longer due to improvements in medicine and a better standard of living; as a result, we are also aware that more people will require palliative care. Therefore, the NHS has taken more responsibility for funding. In the past, hospices were funded totally by voluntary contributions, but with the realisation that the number of people needing palliative care was increasing, the NHS had to accept that responsibility—quite right too. Palliative care services were provided in some hospitals, but the voluntary hospices were still essential to supply the total need. We know that fundraising is essential to the upkeep of the many voluntary hospices.

The management and volunteers at the local Springhill hospice in Rochdale, which serves my constituency—and serves it so well—have come up with ever more innovations to persuade people to part with their money in the worthiest of causes. There is, for example, the annual man and woman of the year luncheon, at which it raises a huge amount of money. I am on one of the committees that organises those events, which are very enjoyable and raise the awareness of the local community. There are concerts, tug-of-wars, sponsored walks and bike rides, auctions, coffee mornings, fairs and other entertainments enjoyed and supported by all in the borough. There is a hospice shop, staffed and run by volunteers, which supplies everything under the sun.

One cannot fault the hard work and commitment that have been put in over the years to keep the hospice movement going as a vibrant, irreplaceable service in the area. I was a member of the local health authority when another member, Margaret Geohagen, started the hospice. It is to her credit that she did so, and she is still its chair.

There is a constant headache of achieving targets each year. Hospices are the victims of their own success. They are now providing specialist palliative care at home and in the hospice; they are providing respite care to give carers a necessary break; they are providing care for families of patients; and, at the same time, they have to deal with the upkeep and refurbishment of the buildings and grounds.

The NHS contributes about a third of the funding of palliative care, as I understand it, in adult hospices run by local charities. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence guidelines suggest that the NHS should commission palliative care services, but that providers may come from the independent sector. The Treasury recommended that all Departments should ensure that the price of contracts reflects the full cost of the service, with a deadline of April 2006. I understand that the Charity Commission states that a charity should not use its resources to supplement what the public bodies should provide, so the NHS should fund the costs of providing palliative services. Hospices should be using their funds to supplement and improve the services funded by the NHS.

I receive letters from my local hospice suggesting that it is not yet receiving the full cost of the service as described by NICE, and there is a bit of uncertainty over its future budgets. Primary care trusts will need to be sure that they are assessing correctly the special palliative care needs in their areas and they must ensure that all such needs are met.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Lady, may I remind Members of the rule about reading? Copious notes are allowed, but reading is not. The hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) appears to be on the first page of his notes. I did advise that Members should be brief.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton for giving way. As the neighbouring constituency MP, my constituents are also served well by Springhill hospice. First, does he agree that there is a role that has not yet been used by the strategic health authority, whereby many hospices serve many PCTs in that the PCTs all—equally and separately—fund what they are meant to fund, rather than putting the weight on one or two PCTs that are fully apprised of the value of the hospice movement?

Secondly, will my hon. Friend add his praise to mine for the hospice movement for the work it does in the palliative care networks? We know the value of the work that the movement does for people in homes and in the hospices, but the problem is the plight of people who have to suffer in hospitals and do not get the same palliative care. The movement has been leading in finding a way to train of lots of nurses in palliative care on the wards.

Jim Dobbin: I accept the points that my hon. Friend is making. She represents a seat in the same borough, so she knows the hospice that I am talking about. I also accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The point that I am coming to is that one Minister needs to be given responsibility for the full provision of palliative care for adults and for children's carers and providers. I want to come to a close, because you have asked us to be brief and more hon. Members want to speak. I pay tribute to the voluntary ethos of the hospice movement and to its dedication to raising funds to keep itself going.

I appreciate all the work that the Government are doing. I ask them to focus a bit more on the financial needs and the financial supports of the hospice movement, particularly the support given to children's hospices throughout the country. There is a dearth of support in that area. That needs to be examined.

2.26 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on securing this debate; I agree with everything he said. I suppose I could sit down immediately, but there are one or two points that I wish to make.

This is not a party political matter; no political party invented hospices. Dame Cicely Saunders has led the movement and I applaud everything she has done. As a member of the Committee that considered the Bill that enabled primary care trusts to come into existence, I say to the Minister that I and many other colleagues made many points about funding at that stage. I hope she will address the issues, specifically funding, as the primary care trusts are expected to deliver practically everything, but that is not quite working as the Minister had told us all.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and I have the privilege of serving on the Health Committee. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point mentioned our report on palliative care and I know that the Minister gave evidence to us.

The Committee was briefed by Dr. Keri Thomas that patients had little real choice about how they would spend their last days. We were told that > "though most of the final year of life is spent at home, most patients still die in hospital."

Will the Minister address that in terms of the back-up service? Locally in Southend, we have a wonderful organisation called SPDNS, which is led by John and

[Mr. David Amess]

Rosalind Matty. They have celebrated 25 years of trying to help people die with dignity at home. However, there are other challenges in terms of getting the necessary staff support to give people the opportunity to die at home if they so wish.

As my hon. Friend said, we are served by three wonderful hospices locally: Little Haven, Fair Havens and St. Luke's. When I was first elected to Parliament in 1983, I knew little about the hospice movement, although I knew about St. Joseph's hospice in Hackney. Within a year, I had celebrated my second miracle in my then constituency—the first was to be elected—which was to be given the great honour of laying the foundation stone of St. Luke's hospice.

That came about through a wonderful lady called Trudy Cox, who was a district nurse. She was called to attend a house, thinking that the person concerned was ill. She walked into the bedroom and the mother lay dead in the bed with her children around her. She said that, after that, she was determined that no one should ever die in those circumstances again. She called a meeting and said that she was not going to argue with the Government about funding, but that she would mortgage her house and there would be a hospice. Within a short time, and with no huge benefactors, St. Luke's hospice was built. It does a wonderful job, just as Little Haven and Fair Havens do.

The adult hospices in England and Wales have given all hon. Members the same briefing. Mine is a tiny contribution in terms of what the Minister might respond to, because she will know that that movement wants full cost recovery. It feels strongly that primary care trusts are required to fund sufficient services to meet local need but that they are not delivering on that. It also feels that commissioning sufficient services for its population should happen in reality and the hospices should not be necessarily left to fill all the gaps.

As the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) said, Government leadership and strategy are very important. The adult hospice movement wants the Government to ensure that there is one Minister with responsibility for joining up palliative care policy across diagnosis for adults and children, working closely with palliative care providers and patient and carer organisations. It also feels that there should be integration with existing quality programmes and streamlining of statutory inspections. We have only to think of our schools being inspected by Ofsted to know how disruptive such a process can be for all concerned.

All Members of Parliament support their local hospices and wish to be associated with their local hospice movement, but I hope that the Minister will deal specifically with how primary care trusts can address the current funding difficulty.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thank the hon. Members who have spoken thus far; they have been exemplary. I call David Taylor.

David Taylor: I do not want to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Sorry, I thought you did. I call Martin Linton.

2.32 pm

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) will make some excellent contributions to the debate.

I thank the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) for applying for the debate because it gives us a chance to discuss the needs of the hospice movement. He has mentioned the Little Haven children's hospice so often that it must have become the most famous hospice, at least among fellow Members of Parliament. I hope to do the same for the Trinity hospice, which was established in 1891, making it the oldest in the United Kingdom. Its catchment area is the whole of south-west London, which has a population of some 750,000 people.

My constituency is at the centre of that catchment area and, although the hospice itself is a few yards outside my constituency, I have good links with it. Those links have become much firmer since April when, like the hon. Member for Castle Point, I ran the marathon as part of the hospice team to raise money for it. I had two targets: one was related to how quickly I could get to the finish, which I just about met, and the other was to try to raise £1,500 for the hospice. I am glad to say that I achieved that, thanks to the generosity of local people and the fact that, as soon the Trinity hospice was mentioned, so many people said, "I just don't know how I can thank that place enough for what it has done for my family." I was able to say to them, "It's easy, you can sponsor me in the marathon." Many people did so and I was able to raise nearly three times the sponsorship target. It is sobering to discover, however, that my £4,000 will keep the hospice going for less than half a day.

Hospices such as Trinity need to fundraise because they do not get 100 per cent. funding from the national health service. As I understand it, the health service will fund the community service—there is a community team at the hospice with about 280 patients on its books—and the bed service. Trinity has about 30 beds, although it could happily double that number. However, when it comes to core needs, Trinity gets only about 45 per cent. of its funding from the health service. The funding does not in any case include complementary therapies not recognised by the NHS such as massage, heart therapy, relaxation therapy and hypnotherapy, which are excellent forms of palliative care. As a result of those two factors, the Trinity hospice gets about 35 per cent. of its funding from the NHS—£2 million out of £6 million.

Many people have mentioned the need for full funding. Talking to my local hospice, I found that it does not want 100 per cent. funding. There are a few NHS hospices in London that are 100 per cent. funded, although there are very few across the rest of the country. Trinity hospice values its independence and freedom, but like most hospices it wants an increase in the percentage of its costs that are funded through the NHS. It would warm to the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire of a 50-50 split between NHS funding and its own fundraising.

Within that general demand are several specific points that concern the hospice. I shall raise them briefly while I have the Minister's ear, so that she can comment on them. The first is even funding between primary care trusts. The hospice has to negotiate with seven different PCTs, and some are likely to offer a higher percentage than others. It is known that some will be in danger next year of short-changing the hospice because of their financial situation. It is important that such organisations as hospices should have the same rate of funding from all PCTs. If there is anything the Department of Health can do to ensure that those PCTs are able to give them the same funding, that will be helpful.

Another point that the hospice raises is that the voluntary sector has great difficulty matching the pay rises for NHS staff, although it has to do that. I would never argue against those pay rises, which are richly deserved, but they should be taken into account in deciding how much to fund the hospices, which have to try to keep pace with NHS increases.

Another suggestion is to work towards a system of funding per head. At present, the block grant is based on last year's occupancy and on 80 per cent. bed occupancy. Trinity achieves a good 96 per cent. bed occupancy, which means that the funding it gets is underfunding. It would be far better if were Trinity funded on the basis of the bed occupancy it achieves, even if that is not 100 per cent.

The hospice has also told me that it would like three-yearly, not one-yearly, budgets. This Government have tried to follow that principle for many voluntary bodies, Government agencies, local authorities and education authorities. We can understand that hospices have an equal need for predictability and dependability in their funding. One of their aims, which they can achieve only with funding improvements, is to expand their care to illnesses other than cancer. Cancer was the original reason for most hospices coming into existence, and the bulk of the palliative care that they give is for that, but there are many other illnesses for which hospice care would be appropriate.

Hospices suffer, perhaps even more than the health service, from bed blocking. Often, that problem depends on a patient finding a nursing home place. Trinity has had examples of people who no longer need hospice care occupying a hospice bed for more than a year while they try to find a nursing home place.

In central London there is a huge problem with parking, which I as a constituency MP have helped to deal with on behalf of district nurses. People working for the hospice can pay about £500 a year for the privilege of parking in the street outside their hospice. The community team needs to be able to move freely around the boroughs to visit the 280 people on its list.

I pay tribute to the chairman of Trinity hospice for the past 10 years, Patrick Hurst. He has brought about a real revolution in the hospice's ability to deal with the demand for its places, including a new capital build plan and far greater services to the community than Trinity was ever able to deliver before. There has been an increase of about 400 per cent. in the community team, and thus a huge increase in the number of patients with whom the hospice is able to deal.

I make those suggestions in the knowledge that the Department of Health and the Government are already doing an enormous amount to help hospices through the primary care trusts, but this is the direction in which hospices—certainly my local hospice—would like them to move in future.

Finally, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I apologise if I have to leave a little early. My excuse is the only one that would cut any ice with you: I have to see Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know the feeling. I call Sir Teddy Taylor.

2.40 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): We all owe a debt to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) for raising this issue, as it concerns many of us. We are all aware of his total commitment to Little Haven. The great work that he does for it is well known and is, I am sure, greatly appreciated. I have had a connection with Fair Havens and Little Haven for many years as an honorary office bearer. All of us are well aware of the fantastic work done by hospices. Of course, they depend enormously on voluntary helpers—without voluntary help, it would be difficult for them to continue—and they have to raise a huge amount of money to ensure that the service is maintained.

I wish to put three brief points to the Minister. One thing that worries me enormously—I hope she will confirm whether this is true or untrue—is that, on the basis of figures I have seen, NHS funding of hospices as a percentage of total spending has decreased in recent years. That should worry us all, irrespective of the Government in power. Obviously, this can happen without people noticing. In 1996–97, 35 per cent. of funding was covered by the NHS. In 2001–02, that fell to only 29 per cent., which is a massive reduction. Since then, there has been the £50 million boost for specialist palliative care, which increased the amount to 32 or 33 per cent. However, we should be aware that that percentage of total spending is still less than it was in 1996–97. That should worry us all.

The hospices in the Southend area and in Castle Point are very fortunate to receive enormous contributions from the local communities, but hard work is required to maintain them and, as expenditure is constantly increasing, that is no easy task. My first question is, does the Minister accept that funding has been reduced and that there is a need to increase it?

Secondly, does the Minister accept that funding for children's hospices is tiny compared with the funding available to hospices generally? Only about 5 per cent. of total funding is provided from public funds, which is very low indeed. In the case of Little Haven, the figure is only 1.9 per cent. When we have had problems in the past, Governments have said to us that there are things we can do. For instance, we can request lottery funding, which has been greatly appreciated. A special fund has been set up, but the plain fact is that it will fall out and stop in 2006.

The main guidance has been that we should go to the primary care trusts. A delightful lady runs one for us in Southend, but there are so many PCTs that it really is a bit confusing. Some hospices have to deal with three, four, five or—in the case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point—15. Trying to get straight guidance from them on how funding should be provided is almost impossible. The Government really need to give clear indications or rules to PCTs as to what funding they should provide for children's hospices. It is no good at all to leave that to discussions. We appreciate that PCTs have a bit of a nightmare, as do all organisations in the health service, in covering all their costs. Therefore, we need a commitment to additional spending and a clear promise that the PCTs will be advised on suitable funding.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Further to the hon. Gentleman's last point, I have a children's hospice in Chorley—Derian House suffers in respect of funding from PCTs. The local PCTs give money, but young children come from as far away as London or Scotland and may make a one-off visit this year, or perhaps in three years, so their PCT never contributes.

The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that children's hospices have always been the poor relation in funding. Does he agree that we ought to have more funding directly from the Secretary of State, or in another way, if funds cannot be channelled through the PCTs equally?

Sir Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman expresses my feelings exactly. I would much prefer to have straight funding from the Government, due to the confusion in the system with all the PCTs. That would be infinitely better as it would clear up a lot, but, on the other hand, we do not want to interfere with the powers given to PCTs because they are very sensitive.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman. If that proposal were possible, great; if not, PCTs should have some clear guidance on the funding needed.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the target set by the Government for funding child and adolescent mental health—guidance referring to a non-ring-fenced target of 10 per cent. growth year on year over the next three years—is a good example? That has been met by nearly all PCTs. Would he recommend that formula to the Government?

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is something for the Minister to consider, because it is far too complicated for me. We need straight indications that, because of the reduction that has taken place, there will be an increase and that PCTs will be given clear guidance. The hon. Lady has mentioned something important that the Minister will need to examine, but I am looking for those two straight pieces of guidance.

I hope that when the Government work out such things as the inspections that are taking place, they will bear in mind the burdens on those running a hospice. Some of our schools have different views on inspections: those that get good reports think they are a wonderful idea while those that get bad reports think they are a very unusual system.

For hospices, the real problem is the time taken up by inspections. My understanding—the Minister can tell me if I am wrong—is that we have two organisations undertaking the inspections; they do not attract much notice and they take up a huge amount of time. Quite honestly, when people have the job of running a hospice, particularly when they depend a great deal on voluntary work, having two such inspections is bad. Surely, through the simplification of democracy, we could have one organisation, and only one, to carry out the inspection. If a hospice gets a good report and is clearly well managed, there should be some means whereby a gap between inspections is introduced for it compared with others.

I hope that the Minister appreciates the huge burdens that hospices have to bear and the enormous task of fundraising undertaken by volunteers. I also hope she realises that problems could arise unless something is done. Many people spend a great deal of time and effort on ensuring the continued operation of hospices, but they need additional help.

The Minister will be aware that the only guidance she has had from Members present is that something should be done. I hope she can provide some guidance. All of us present appreciate the special interest taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point, and we thank him for giving us the opportunity to raise these important issues.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If Members are brief, I can get one or possibly two more speakers in. Ignore the annunicator; we know what we are talking about.

2.48 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am glad that you said that before I rose to speak and I hope that you feel that way at the end.

I will be brief because much has already been said. I probably need only clarify. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) for homing in on where we can make progress.

I have asked questions and raised this issue particularly in relation to children's hospices. The Rainbows hospice in my constituency is only 10 years old; it was 10 years old last month. It has celebrated great growth in that time, and it continues to want to grow. It is a happy place. The first time I visited, I was rather nervous, thinking that it would be a deeply depressing place, but far from it. I had my photograph taken in the ball pit with some of the children, and we really enjoyed ourselves. I left with mixed emotions of joy and an understanding of what a hospice is really about. The hospice serves many PCTs and has exactly the same problems as those already mentioned.

I want to raise the specific problem that occurs when social services departments use the hospices. The county council passed a motion supporting a campaign run by the local newspaper and me, until I wrote to the council to say, "Congratulations on supporting the campaign to fund the Rainbows hospice. If your social services department were to pay up, it would make some difference." I have still not had a reply to that letter, strangely enough. Perhaps today's debate will trigger the county council to deliver some of the cash. It uses the services; it needs to pay.

The matter comes down to the specific issue about guidelines. Like most Members, I have spoken to my local PCT. I encouraged all the Members I know in the east midlands to do that. The PCT will say, "Yeah, we totally agree. We should be funding children's hospices." It is wonderful, is it not? However, when it comes to the detailed negotiation, the money is not there, or it is not the priority at that time. The Department of Health will say, "It is a priority and the PCT should be funding it", and we get caught in a muddle.

The only way forward is if we establish some guidelines and guidance that, while not exerting extreme pressure, make it clear to PCTs and to social services departments that use those facilities for health matters that we expect them not to pay 100 per cent. but to pay the 40 per cent. that we estimate is used to provide health service care at our hospice. PCTs should just pay their way. That is not a Stalinist diktat from the centre. We need some simple guidelines that make it clear to every PCT in the country that it ought to pay its fair share.

I congratulate everyone at Rainbows on their hard work in raising £1.5 million every year. What a daunting prospect it is to wake up every 1 April knowing that one needs to raise another £1.5 million, but every year they do it. Fortunately, I did not have to do a marathon. They are going to get me to jump out of an aeroplane with a parachute. Suddenly, the marathon sounds a lot more enticing.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

2.51 pm

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) not only for securing the debate but for covering so many of the important points that we came along to make. I will try not to repeat any more than is necessary to make my points.

St. Christopher's hospice opened in my constituency not long after I was elected. There is a history of concern about primary care trust funding for hospices. I hope that, by the time that we go into the next election, we will have resolved the issue. Three and a half years ago, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) and I went to see the then Minister in charge of children's care, the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper). We discussed two issues: the difficulty in securing PCT funding and regionalisation.

After that meeting, we all came away feeling that we needed stronger guidelines—particularly with children's hospices—about regional cover. Otherwise, we end up with fundraising in adjacent areas almost in competition. There is a problem and it needs to be dealt with.

We did not get very far though—nothing much happened on the funding that we hoped for—so, in October 2002, I wrote to the next Minister. By March 2003, another Minister was in place. I was fortunate to secure an Adjournment debate in May 2003 and the Minister made it clear that PCTs should contribute. At that point, I made the history clear—the fact that the chief executive of my local children's hospice had been round the PCTs and not succeeded. However, I was again given the advice that the PCTs should contribute. Since then, the chief executive has been round again and not succeeded. I tell that story to make it clear that people have been trying to resolve the issue for a long time.

I invite the Minister to visit St. Christopher's hospice. We invited the Minister for Children, Young People and Families, the right hon. Member for Barking (Margaret Hodge), and she said that it was not her job. It is important that a Minister visits to look at the brilliant work that is being done by St. Christopher's. I am sure that it is on a par with what is being done across the country.

The important thing is the justice of the issue. We talked about where the Government should play their part. I agree with Members who suggested that we should have a Minister with responsibility for palliative care. We all have huge fundraising efforts. In my area, Standard Life Healthcare, Allianz Cornhill and the cricketer Adam Hollioake do huge amounts of work, as do lots of ordinary people. However, they should not be doing it in the knowledge that the Government are not stepping up to the mark. We are looking not for 100 per cent. funding—hospice care is different from hospital care—but for funding to provide those elements that the national health service would provide if the hospice were not there. That is a matter of justice. I hope that we get it. I would like to go into the next general election knowing that we have got that point nailed once and for all.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on securing this important debate, and commend the many contributions that have been made in the debate and the points that have been made to the Minister. I want to illuminate and add to some of those points and to ask the Minister some questions to which the debate begs answers.

The need for such services is beyond doubt and, like the hon. Gentleman, I cannot miss the opportunity of expressing my appreciation of the work of the hospice in my constituency. St. Raphael's hospice covers the population in my constituency and that of Merton borough. It has a fantastic team of staff and an extraordinary team of volunteers, who go out of their way to make a difference to the quality of life of patients and families who are struggling to cope with the difficult circumstances that brought them to the hospice. Two hundred and fifty volunteers play a part in that hospice and I take my hat off to them for their efforts.

The local paper, the Sutton Guardian, recently launched a campaign to raise £50,000 to expand the services provided by St. Raphael's hospice. In less than three months, it hit the halfway mark, which indicates how powerfully hospices move local populations, how strongly people feel attached to them and how much people are willing to dip into their own pockets to ensure that their hospice survives, thrives and continues to support people in the local community.

That brings me to the first and key question of funding. Will the Minister tell us something about the road map for realising the Treasury cross-cutting review of the voluntary sector? That review was published in 2002. As we have heard, it said that, when there is a statutory responsibility for a service, even if it is provided within the voluntary sector, there is a requirement for full reimbursement of costs. What is the plan to ensure that that conclusion, which the Treasury reached in 2002, becomes reality by 2006?

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

Clearly, it is not appropriate in the long run—it is not defensible even now—that hospices rely on charitable and lottery funding to pay for services that would be free if they were provided within the NHS. Trustees have a legal duty not to use charitable money for such purposes and, given what the Treasury has said, there will come a point when the Charity Commission will have to step in to question whether the level of funding is adequate to meet the need.

We have had the figures showing how the level of funding for adult hospice care has fluctuated and fallen compared with the level only a few years ago. If adult hospice care is the Cinderella of services in palliative care, children's hospice care is the poor relation of that Cinderella. To have only 5 per cent. of its funding from the NHS cannot be an adequate or acceptable measure of the support that we as taxpayers should be prepared to put into such an important service.

Many hon. Members have described the lottery of PCTs accepting their responsibility in principle but not picking it up in practice. Where children's hospices seek to work out who they have a relationship in respect of planning and commissioning services and whom to talk to about the new arrangements for payment by results, how will that go forward? Surely, this is an area in which specialist commissioning has a part to play, given that it cannot be right for voluntary organisations to have to play a game of chasing multiple PCTs to find the right person to release resources.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I want to ask my hon. Friend a question on behalf of the Shooting Star Trust, which is just starting to open its doors as a children's hospice in my constituency. Is there a logical basis for the disadvantageous funding of children's hospices, which the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) emphasised? The purpose of hospices is to provide respite care and the cost of looking after children in a hospice is often disproportionately higher. Why are children's hospices discriminated against in this way?

Mr. Burstow: In his question, my hon. Friend has put his finger on the nub of the matter. We are effectively talking about discrimination being perpetuated in the system of funding hospice care. It cannot be right or acceptable that children's hospices that provide core services that social services and the NHS want to use have to rely heavily on flag days and other fundraising devices to cover their costs.

It is vital to remember that we should focus not only on the very important work that palliative and hospice care provides for those with cancer. More than 95 per cent. of the services in hospices are concentrated on that group, but there are more than 300,000 people with degenerative and other diseases who would benefit from palliative care and hospice care. In evidence to the Select Committee report, the British Lung Foundation made representations about coronary obstructive pulmonary disease and people with that condition who would benefit from palliative care. We have heard about motor neurone disease and how people from that group are very fortunate if they can access hospice care. However, many do not, which also applies to those with dementia of one sort or another.

Reference has been made to social care and its role. It is incumbent upon the Government to be a lot clearer about where the line is drawn with regard to who is responsible for funding those services. I am thinking in particular of the issue of continuing NHS care, which was explored during the Select Committee's inquiry, but has not been satisfactorily dealt with through answers from the Government.

Quite recently, I asked a question to find out when the Government will be publishing their review of where strategic health authorities had got to in considering the criteria in respect of continuing care. I received an answer that did not relate at all to the question that I asked, and I hope that the Minister will give us some idea of when we shall see the outcome of that review.

During our inquiry, we were told that people were still in a situation where arbitrary time periods on when funding would be available were set by strategic health authorities. A person could be 11 weeks from death—I do not know how on earth someone comes to that judgment— and then they would get continuing care funding from the NHS. The period may be nine weeks or eight weeks. None of those procedures is lawful or fits within the guidance that the Department issues. How can that be allowed and tolerated and what is being done to change it? Will the Minister tell us today where the Government have got to with their long-awaited review?

This is an important area of public policy. Parliament should be debating it, and the Government should focus their attention on it, whether through a Minister or a national service framework for palliative care—I think that the latter is more likely to pull the threads together than simply having a figurehead. It is right and proper to have this debate. We need to see the funding put in and the services developing. Of those people who could benefit, only 1 per cent. benefit from palliative care in this country. That is an appalling indictment. More people must benefit from such services in future.

3.3 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on giving us the opportunity to have this important debate, which has generated considerable interest, shown not least by the number of hon. Members who wished to take part in it. I was particularly pleased that he secured the debate because he rightly and with justification spoke about the Little Haven children's hospital in his constituency, in the south of Essex. I welcome and recognise what he said about the excellent work that that hospice does because it also serves my constituency, alongside the children's hospice based in Cambridge, which also provides that service.

Along with many other hon. Members who have contributed to the debate, I have an adult hospice in my constituency, Farleigh hospice, which has done a fantastic job during the past 18 to 20 years in looking after adults in need of palliative care. Like all hospices, it works day in, day out, through the tremendous work that the staff do in the hospice, and also through the work of an army of volunteers who help with the running of the hospice and, equally, with fundraising.

We all know from our own experiences in our constituencies how extremely expensive it is to provide palliative care and the extent of the demands on that service. Public-spirited, generous individuals do amazing work day in, day out, coming up with novel ideas for raising money to help to ensure that this fantastic endeavour continues providing a seamless service for some of the most vulnerable members of our local communities.

The extent of the work that is done up and down the country is tremendous. Let me give just a few figures. There are 216 adult hospitals with palliative care units in the country, with 25 for children alone. There are 3,096 beds, with 196 beds on top of that for children. There are 51 beds per 1 million of the population. The average size of a hospice is 15 beds, seven for children. The most common size of a hospice is 10 beds. The estimated number of admissions per year is 59,000. The estimated number of new admissions is 41,000. The mean length of stay is 13 and a half days. The estimated number of deaths in palliative care in hospices is 29,000.

That is a tremendous input into the entire provision of palliative care. Like other hospices, Farleigh hospice has been fundraising over the past few years so that it can move from its existing site. It has secured a site by Broomfield hospital, which is part of the Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust, and it is building a far larger hospice by private donation, having raised a considerable number of millions of pounds with help from other areas. That is the way forward because the demand for palliative care is always going to be increasing.

Therefore, we return to one of the common themes that has run through this whole debate, which is the question of funding. Few if any people within the hospice movement would want to see 100 per cent. funding from central Government. That is not the aim, or the aspiration of the hospice movement. What the people in that movement believe is that they need their efforts—their fundraising efforts, and the time and energy they put into making sure that the palliative care in the hospices is second to none—to be recognised more in financial terms by the Government. That would help to ease some of the pressures that are placed on them to raise what are phenomenal sums of money in order to keep the hospices running. The hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) said that he took part in the London marathon, that he raised £4,000 or £4,500 for his local hospice, and that that was equivalent to about half a day's running of the hospice. That figure puts into perspective the sheer extent of the costs.

Other hon. Members talked about the money that the NHS has made available to the hospice movement over the past six or seven years. I am not going to claim that the Government have cut the funding to the hospice movement, because they have not. However, the Minister will recognise that, as a number of my hon. Friends and others have said, the contribution that the NHS makes to the hospice movement fell between 1996–97 and 2001–02 from about 35 per cent. of the costs of running a hospice to 29 per cent. That proportion has improved somewhat since 2001–02, because the Government made £50 million available for palliative care. Even so, the figure is still somewhere between the top end of 32 per cent. and 33.33 per cent., which is lower than in 1996–97—it was 35 per cent. then.

Part of that problem is simply that health service inflation is considerably higher than the retail prices index, or other methods of managing and assessing inflation. The Government must consider that again, not only for adult services but, as several hon. Members have said, for children's services in particular. For the average funding for children's hospices coming from the NHS to be 5 per cent. is unreasonable, as I am sure the Minister will accept. That is why my party made a manifesto commitment at the 2001 election that the NHS contribution to the hospice movement—both adult and children's hospices—would be 40 per cent. of the running costs if we were returned to government. That remains our pledge for the next election, because we recognise the important role that the hospice movement plays in the provision of palliative care.

I want to consider two other funding matters. The first, which many hon. Members have raised, is the fact that many hospices do not cover just a single constituency, a single PCT or even, in some cases, a single strategic health authority area. In my area, mid-Essex, the Farleigh hospice has to deal with at least five PCTs. It is important that Ministers in the Department of Health look at that again. I am not arguing that they should take away the powers of PCTs, because they were established to devolve powers to the localities, so that local people could take local decisions to meet local health needs and commitments. However, I am arguing for some rationalisation, so that there is more consistency and ease for hospices to deal with PCTs as a group, rather than having to deal with each, one by one.

The second problem, whose resolution would greatly benefit the hospice movement, is that, more often than not, particularly because of the financial pressures on PCTs, it can be late in the day—even early in the next financial year—before they decide what to fund their local hospice with. That causes problems with the provision of service.

The Government, to their credit, have changed the system in other sectors of health provision, so that announcements are made on a three-year rolling programme of future funding, which gives more stability and more opportunity for planning. That is a positive step, and I ask the Minister to examine whether it would be possible and reasonable to bring in such a mechanism for PCTs when they consider funding for hospices. That would give hospices more security and enable more straightforward future planning.

There is a gap in the hospice movement in provision for the age group of 18 to 40-year-olds. There is only one hospice in England that caters for that group, based in Oxford. There is a significant difference between the needs of that age group and those of the more elderly population and children. That was brought home to me by a constituent, Mrs. Whiffen, whose son Jonathan died aged 19 from a degenerative disease. He was looked after in the children's hospice in Cambridge for some years, but when he became 16 or 17, he and his mother felt that he had outgrown the services there. The service had been wonderful for him until then, but now that he had grown older, he felt that it provided more of a children's environment.

Mrs. Whiffen was concerned because, when Jonathan went to an adult hospice, the average age of the patients being cared for there was 72, a considerable jump for a teenager. She feels—there is some justification for this—that more needs to be done to meet the requirements of that age group, rather than placing those young people in hospices where the population is of a more mature age, and where their needs and desires might conflict with those of more mature individuals. She is trying to do something about that in the Chelmsford area by seeking to raise funds to set up a hospice somewhere in mid-Essex to replicate the services provided by the hospice for young adults in Oxford. More must be done in that field.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burns: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, I will not because I have spoken for my time and I do not want to encroach on the Minister's time.

In conclusion, no one in this debate has questioned the dedication, hard work and fantastic achievement of all those involved in the hospice movement and that field of palliative care. We just ask the Minister, who I am sure recognises and accepts many of our arguments, that more be done to meet the financial costs of providing that fantastic care.

3.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I join all other Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) on instigating today's debate. I know that he takes a keen interest in this issue, and it is obvious from the quality of today's contributions that many other Members also take such an interest.

Like other Members, I acknowledge the outstanding work done by all in the hospice movement who care for those in need of specialist palliative care. I entirely endorse the closing remarks of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on their role. The contribution of the voluntary hospice movement cannot be overestimated, and our partnership with it is very important. I recognise that the voluntary contribution to hospices is a tremendous strength of the movement and a tremendous success, and I recognise the big role that voluntary activity in hospices plays in our lives.

For adult hospices, the partnership that I mentioned has been strengthened nationally through the joint NHS-voluntary sector national partnership group for palliative care, chaired by the national cancer director. That group includes representatives from the local voluntary sector, NHS hospices, Help the Hospices, the Independent Hospice Representative Committee and the National Council for Palliative Care. At a local level, cancer networks have established effective partnerships for service planning and provision, ensuring that local voluntary and statutory sector services work in effective partnership and co-ordination.

On the children's palliative care side, the Department has observer status on the council of the Association for Children with Life-threatening or Terminal Conditions and their Families, and we are in regular contact with the Association of Children's Hospices. We have worked with the council and the association to promote children's palliative care and sponsored projects being taken forward by both organisations. We have also worked with the New Opportunities Fund, which has been mentioned, and which is providing important funding for projects in support of children with life-threatening illnesses.

In passing, I want to address the question of a Minister for palliative care. I am the Minister with responsibility for adult palliative care, and my colleague the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), is the Minister who deals with children's hospices. I realise that an argument is being advanced in this debate for putting those roles together. However, my betting is that had we done so, various people would have bobbed up in this debate to make a point about the need to separate children and adults because their needs are very different. I have just heard a version of an argument about why such roles need to be separated, because of the needs of different age groups.

There is no easy way of cutting up this particular cake to find the best possible answer, but what we have is in my view the right approach—considering the needs of children in this area alongside those of all children, who are, broadly speaking, very different from adults. I take the point that we are not yet necessarily meeting the needs of adolescents, nor perhaps of people in their early 20s. I am not quite sure about the age band mentioned by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford, but I fear that my children of around that age would not really identify themselves with people aged 40. I am sure that there are others in a similar position.

The work of the Select Committee on Health has been extremely helpful. The Committee has praised the initiatives to double the palliative care work force and the £50 million extra investment that has already been mentioned, and particularly the funding for black and ethnic community projects and services for children. The Committee and we accept that more needs to be done, and we need to ensure that integrated services are in place to meet the needs of patients who are receiving palliative care, regardless of their diagnoses. We all recognise that a lot of the palliative care is still provided to cancer patients, certainly on the adult side, but less on the children's services side, where there is a greater mix. We need to recognise that there are issues. The question of the integration of services remains a high priority for the Government.

I should like to deal briefly with a couple of points about adult hospices before moving on to children. First, I recognise that some of the points made and concerns expressed about funding relate both to adults' and children's hospices. Those arguments have been advanced in both quarters, although they have been advanced particularly in relation to children's hospices this afternoon. The 2000 NHS cancer plan pledged to increase the funding for specialist cancer care services for adults by 2004, with the £50 million that we have put in. That additional funding is for services in their entirety, and not only for hospices. It helps to tackle inequalities in access to specialists in palliative care and enable the NHS to make a realistic contribution to the costs that hospices incur in providing agreed levels of service. We have met that commitment and ensured that the moneys reach the front-line services. We set up a central budget for three years to do that, which has ensured that the money is protected.

Mr. Burstow: Does the Minister agree that, because the money is being channelled to provide services for cancer patients, it excludes everyone else—the 300,000 people a year who have degenerative diseases, but not cancer, and who would benefit?

Miss Johnson: The money is for specialist palliative care, and although it comes from that route, there will be flexibilities.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Johnson: I would rather make some progress, because hon. Members have raised so many points that I do not have the chance to answer many of them in any case.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister answer on funding?

Miss Johnson: I am coming to that.

Before the additional funding was granted, independent adult hospices received an average of 28 per cent. of their annual costs from the NHS. That percentage has now increased. Although we do not have the final figures for the whole country, preliminary data from monitoring in 2003–04 shows that £24.5 million or 54 per cent of the £45.8 million reported on so far has gone to voluntary sector organisations, and mostly to hospices. Some £8.2 million has supported new developments and £16.3 million has supported existing services. The remainder has supported services in the NHS, or if it has not been spent in-year; it has been protected for future use for palliative care. The £50 million is recurrent in the PCT baselines.

Mr. Burns: The Minister said that the figure was 28 per cent. and that it rose, but everyone else understands that, as a proportion of the total cost, it was 35 per cent., dropping to 29 per cent. by 2001–02. Why is there a discrepancy in the figures?

Miss Johnson: The hon. Gentleman will understand that if a huge amount extra is put into in the NHS, as we have been doing, the proportion may drop when one looks at the whole. There is an increase in the funding for hospices coming through the routes about which we are talking, as I said a moment ago.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Miss Johnson: No; I have seven minutes in which to deal with a lot of points.

On three-year funding and the short-term issues that all the hospices need to address, the PCTs have received the three-year funding and have already got £50 million extra, specifically for palliative care for the three years between 2005 and 2007–08. There is no reason why they should not make commitments in the longer term, rather than year by year. We recognise that there is a need for more funding, but we have met the commitment in the cancer plan, and PCTs must assess their local priorities. Hon. Members are adopting different attitudes to that issue. On one hand, people are urging us to go down the road of devolving more responsibilities to a local level, as we are rightly doing, and at the same time, whenever there is an issue on which people want to see a change locally, they are coming back to the centre of Government, saying, "You should legislate on these matters and provide central direction."

We believe that payment by results will be important in future and will radically change the arrangements for funding care providers. It will comprise a nationally set tariff for most service activity, including services provided by voluntary or independent sector providers, and it will be built on treatments and activities called health care resource groups. We remain on course to implement payment by results for adult palliative care in the NHS and the voluntary sector by 2008–09. A lot of work is under way at the moment, including that of the national partnership group, which is working to validate the costs incurred by a range of hospices. That work will inform the development of the health care resource groups.

Much of the debate has concentrated on children's hospices. The hon. Member for Castle Point has previously made points about the need to provide a general uplift in funding for children's hospices, and that has been the theme of some of the contributions this afternoon. However, he has made the assumption that a central funding directive would offer a practicable method of achieving that. On previous occasions, it has been suggested that we should base such an uplift in funding on some predetermined linkage to adult hospices or on a pre-set percentage of hospice running costs, rather than allow the level of NHS funding to be determined by NHS servicing arrangements.

Although I entirely share the hon. Gentleman's desire to see the children's hospice movement succeed, I cannot agree with the proposed solutions. Children's palliative care involves a much longer-term provision than adult palliative care, and it is structured around the successful management of serious chronic conditions at home rather than in the hospice. As Members have seen for themselves, such care is about promoting the quality of life associated with domesticity, social interaction, growth, increasing independence and the customary pursuits and developmental achievements of childhood. As a number of Members have commented, it is as much a celebration of life as anything else.

Support measures in the children's home, access to education and social activity are all key to that achievement, and it is important that the PCTs ensure that provision is properly balanced and that there is full availability of home care in their areas. Directions to PCTs to fund hospices by some given percentage could easily unbalance the essential mix of care, and favouring hospice care over home care could diminish the latter. The majority of child and adolescent deaths occur at home; a mistaken comment was made about that earlier. Linking the level of funding for a children's hospice to that of an adult hospice would ignore local perspectives and experience. I am glad that many Members support the extra money going into the NHS, although it is not supported equally by all parties when it comes to overall national funding decisions.

On the role of the national service framework for children and palliative care provision, we of course have a role in securing the right level of hospice services for children. That is why there was a module focused on support for disabled children in the recently launched NSF for children. Copies of the complete set of NSF documents are, or will be, placed in the Library. I shall ensure that the hon. Member for Castle Point in particular receives a copy of the disabled child document, which includes a specific section on palliative care and the support of children with life-threatening illnesses. It clearly identifies that high-quality palliative care services should be available for all the children and young people who need them. That goes a long way towards addressing the points made by Members about the need for a clear central statement of what is being called for. That is in the children's NSF.

That section notes that palliative care services are provided by a network of agencies and that close co-ordination and liaison are essential. It also notes the importance that we attach to recognising the changing needs of young people receiving palliative care as they move on from children's services. It therefore goes some way towards meeting the point made by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford.

We are saying clearly that local authorities, PCTs and NHS trusts must ensure that palliative care services provide high-quality, sensitive support that takes account of the physical, emotional and practical needs of the children or young people and their families, including their siblings; that services maximise choice, independence and creativity to promote their quality of life; that services are delivered where the child and the family want them—in the home, hospital, hospice or any other setting; that services include the prompt availability of equipment to support care; that palliative and terminal care services are regularly reviewed with parents, or carers and patients; that gaps in provision are identified or addressed; and that issues such as short-term breaks are also taken into account. In order to help the PCTs in their strategic development of those services, we aim to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up. I thank all Members for their co-operation. We managed to hear seven Back-Bench contributions and four interventions from Members who did not contribute. It is thanks to the co-operation that has been given that we have managed it.

Driving Without Entitlement (Penalties)

3.30 pm

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am delighted to have this opportunity to launch this short debate on penalties for driving without entitlement. I am glad to see that the Minister is about to take his place, because I know what an interest he takes in the issue. I should say at the outset that I am grateful for the briefings and advice that I and other hon. Members have received from the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety or PACTS. I am also grateful for the interest that the media have taken in the subject, and in particular for the campaign run by The Sun. Also, I support the campaign by the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), who presented a ten-minute Bill, of which I was pleased to be a co-sponsor, just before the summer recess. We wish that well.

On 12 October 2003, a year ago yesterday, there was a horrific crash in Hove, which is adjacent to my constituency. My constituent Natalie McCabe, known as Flo, a 21-year-old nursery nurse, and her friend Vicki Browne, aged 19, died in that horrific crash. Becky Fish, the third passenger, lost a leg, and will be maimed for life. The driver was a 21-year-old barman, who was relatively unscathed and later found hiding in a shop doorway. He had no licence. In fact, he had never possessed a licence or passed his test. He had no tax and no insurance for the car. It was estimated that he was driving at 60 mph in a 30 mph zone in the middle of town, and he was almost two times over the alcohol limit. The cruel irony was that he had offered to drive the girls home as he thought that it would be safer.

On 18 March this year, the driver was sentenced to five and a half years' imprisonment on two counts of causing death by dangerous driving, driving without a licence and insurance, and drink-driving. At least he had the decency to plead guilty. He was also banned from driving for five years. I do not know what the significance of that is, given that he had no licence in the first place. Perhaps he will seek to take driving lessons while he is in jail.

In April, the family asked the Solicitor-General whether she would review the case on the basis that too lenient a sentence had been handed out. Unfortunately, the Solicitor-General declined and said that there were no grounds for doing so. The driver will be eligible to get out of prison to go for job interviews next Easter. In January 2006, he will be eligible to apply for early release and by July 2006, if he behaves himself, it is likely that he will be released, despite the seriousness of the crimes. Meanwhile, the McCabe family and the family of Vicki Browne have each lost a daughter, both of whom had everything to live for. The tragedy has overshadowed the families. To add insult to injury, the McCabe family had to pay for the funeral expenses plus VAT. They are to get a headstone on which they will also be charged VAT.

The McCabe family did not take the matter lying down. Despite their obvious grief, they decided to get up and do something about the injustice suffered by the families. They campaigned for a change in the law to include a separate penalty category for drivers without a licence who maim or kill. They contend that that should carry a similar sentence to death by dangerous driving. They also advocate a system whereby drivers are required to display a valid driving licence and insurance documents on the windscreen of their vehicle.

I support that campaign and have given the family every assistance. It culminated yesterday, which marked the first anniversary of Flo's death, with the McCabes—the parents and other members of the family—coming to Westminster to present a petition signed by more than 23,000 people from my constituency and neighbouring areas in Sussex. The petition was presented to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and last night I presented the petition formally on the Floor of the House. The family gathered that amazing number of signatures mainly by standing outside shopping centres every weekend for most of the past year. The McCabe family also e-mailed all Members of Parliament asking them to support early-day motion 1495 on penalties for driving illegally, which I tabled back in July. So far almost 90 hon. Members have signed it, and I hope that more across the political spectrum will add their support to it. Throughout the year, the McCabe family have been campaigning under the slogan "You don't need a licence to kill".

I pay tribute to the courage and dignity of the McCabe family and to the way in which they have responded to such an enormous tragedy. However, they—and I—now want action. This is not just a constituency issue that is relevant to me; it is relevant nationwide. It is an issue that has inspired many debates in this Chamber, as it has several early-day motions and private Member's Bills. I have referred already to the hon. Member for South Dorset.

The extent of the problem is alarming. It has been estimated that 1.25 million people are driving without insurance. It has been assessed that that is 5 per cent. of all drivers. That compares with an estimate of only 1 per cent. of drivers in other northern European countries who are driving without insurance. It is also estimated that about 1.75 million drivers are driving untaxed vehicles, which is 6 per cent. of all drivers. Most worryingly though, it has been calculated that such unentitled drivers are nine times more likely to be involved in accidents and 10 times more likely to have driving convictions. It has been assessed that unlicensed drivers commit about 9.5 per cent. of all recorded motoring offences and that almost two thirds of them do not tell their passengers that they are driving illegally—as was the case with Natalie McCabe and her friends a year ago. It has also been calculated that such irresponsible behaviour adds at least £500 million to the insurance premiums of responsible drivers who are entitled to drive.

Having a road traffic accident is one thing; having a road traffic accident while under the influence of alcohol is bad enough, as it has been estimated that 6 per cent. of all accidents involve drink-driving; but not being entitled to drive and getting behind the wheel of what can be a lethal weapon, as was clearly the case that night a year ago, is completely unacceptable. It is sticking two fingers up at society, the law and responsible citizens, the majority of whom go about their business lawfully and much more safely.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): This is a very important debate and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing it. I wish to bring an extra dimension to our discussion and refer to the interaction between military law and civil law. I had the most ghastly experience in my constituency in which a young lady aged only 18 years lost her life in a car driven by a soldier who was serving in Palace barracks in Holywood, County Down. It transpired that that particular soldier had been disqualified months beforehand in Scotland. The Army at Palace barracks had been notified but that gentleman continued to be allowed to drive in Northern Ireland while disqualified—on duty, I understand—and while there were two warrants for his arrest. The interaction between civil and military law must be examined in respect of those who are disqualified drivers and not legally entitled to drive on our roads—on or off duty.

Tim Loughton: I am very alarmed to hear what the hon. Lady says. I cannot comment on that case, but I am sure that she will be taking it up with the relevant authorities. When there are agencies of government that could avoid such accidents, it is doubly unacceptable that they have happened.

Generally, the United Kingdom has a good safety record. In 2003, 1,169 drivers, 600 car passengers and 774 pedestrians were killed. That sounds a lot. Of course it is far too many, but it compares with a figure of about 40,000 drivers who were killed in the United States. Men are three times more likely than women to die in traffic accidents. However, just over 3.9 per cent. of all fatal or personal injury crashes involved a driver who was subsequently prosecuted for unlicensed driving, while about 14,500 drivers who caused injury or death went untraced. That figure has been increasing. In my constituency in West Sussex, 89 pedestrians were killed or seriously injured, including 23 children, and 41 cyclists died. So, there is a problem in my area and throughout the whole country, but what are the penalties?

Currently, the average fine for driving while not entitled to do so is £150 and occasionally some points. The maximum penalty is £5,000, disqualification and potentially six months in jail, but it is used very rarely. For the risk of a £150 fine, a person can buy what is virtually a disposable car. It is not a bad bet for people to drive recklessly on the basis that they do not really need the car if it is of low value anyway.

There have been some improvements, such as the merging of the DVLA database with the industry-run motor insurance computer database, so that non-insured drivers can be chased automatically. Some years ago in my constituency, PC Jeff Tooley was knocked down in Shoreham while on speed traffic control by a white van driven by somebody who did not stop. It turned out that the driver was over the limit. He was eventually apprehended, but the sentence that he received was later reduced from six years. That sentence could have been higher if he had stolen the policeman's motor car rather than knocked him down and killed him. I am glad to say that the Government have responded to that issue, and I am sure that that was one case that contributed to the weight of opinion that brought about an increase in the penalty for causing death by dangerous driving to 14 years' imprisonment, which we welcome.

[Tim Loughton]

There has also been greater use of automatic vehicle number plate recognition and the possibility of powers being given to traffic wardens. We welcome the greater use of technology. However, overall the number of traffic police has sharply declined in recent years and it is not viewed as a priority. There are concerns that too many people are still flouting the law. The Road Traffic (New Drivers) Act 1995 revokes the licence of a new driver who accumulates six penalty points within two years of passing the driving test, but as at April 2004, of the 78,000 drivers who have been disqualified under the 1995 Act, only 37,000—fewer than half—have successfully retested. What has happened to the other 40,000? Have they just given up driving? I very much doubt it. I fear that many of them are driving while not entitled to do so.

There has been some progress on the number of prosecutions. In 2002, there were 24,338 prosecutions for driving, or for causing or permitting another person to drive, other than in accordance with a licence. That was up from 23,482 prosecutions 10 years earlier. However, too many people are still getting away with it. I fear that the Government are not going to review penalties as they stand.

I am glad to see the report from Professor David Greenaway at Nottingham university, which identifies the scale of the problem. He recommends the greater use of technology to catch offenders before they can cause accidents. He also recommends considering the confiscation of cars, which is a policy that my party certainly supports—whether or not the car is owned by the driver. We need separate penalty categories in order to send out a clear message. The McCabes were obviously disappointed that the judge did not even use the tougher penalty from the maximum range allowed to him.

Perhaps we need to be more imaginative in sentencing too. A judge in Texas recently ruled in a fatal road rage crash that the offender must carry a photograph of the mangled wreckage from the horrendous crash that he caused; that he should take medicine that will make him violently ill if he drinks alcohol; that he must drive only vehicles of less than 130 hp; and that he must display a bumper sticker asking other motorists to ring the local probation department if he is driving recklessly. Those are quite extreme alternatives, but they are imaginative and they get to the heart of the problem.

I ask that, as part of the review I know that the Government are carrying out, they consider bringing in a separate category of offence for drivers who cause accidents while not entitled to drive, and who stick two fingers up at the rest of us, who go about our business lawfully. There should be serious penalties attached to that offence along the lines of causing death by dangerous driving.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I support all that my hon. Friend is saying. I suggest that he also ask the Minister to go on reviewing whether there should be extra penalties for drivers involved in a crash who do not stop even though they are pretty sure that someone has been injured. In the case of Callum Oakford, the late brother of Kathryn Proudfoot, in my constituency, the driver may have been driving only carelessly—he was uninsured and without a licence—but he certainly drove away knowing that an injury had been caused.

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend makes a very important point, which I was going to finish on. I was aware of the case, which hit the headlines nationally and locally. What made that case all the worse was that not only was the person who caused the accident not entitled to drive and should not have been there in the first place, but they did not stop afterwards despite having known that someone had been knocked down and was seriously injured—he eventually died. If anything could have been done to save the life of that child, it was incumbent on the driver, however bad the accident for which he may have been responsible, to help out. The fact that he just drove on is quite outrageous and another factor that must be taken into account.

None of this will bring back Flo McCabe or Vicki Browne. However, changes along the lines that the family and I are suggesting might go some way to preventing more Flo McCabes or Vicki Brownes from losing their young lives needlessly. A change in the law would be a fitting response to the strength of feeling of those 23,000 people who signed the petition, and it would be a fitting tribute to the courage, determination and bravery shown by the family and parents of the two girls who have worked so hard on the campaign.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on securing this debate on penalties for driving without entitlement. As he said, he has tabled early-day motion 1495, which has attracted signatures from hon. Members from all parties. I have learned through this debate, and through others in which I have participated with him, that he has a knack of assiduously taking the concerns and the experience of his constituents and applying them to wider issues of public policy. I congratulate him on the way in which he has done that again today. I welcome the spirit in which he mentioned the work of my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight). I am also pleased that the hon. Members for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) and for North Down (Lady Hermon) have been able to participate and raise issues of constituency concern to them.

I want to take the opportunity to join the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham in offering my sincere condolences to the families of Natalie McCabe and Victoria Browne. As we have heard, they died so tragically just a year ago yesterday. As the hon. Gentleman explained, the driver of the car in which they were passengers was disqualified from driving; he was uninsured and was over the drink-drive and speed limits. He was sentenced to five and a half years' imprisonment on two counts of causing death by dangerous driving.

I know that the families of the victims felt that the sentence was lenient, and the hon. Gentleman referred to that. They requested that the Crown Prosecution Service consider referring the case to the Attorney-General as an unduly lenient sentence. As we have heard, that did not take place, because the sentence fell within the range of the relevant guideline. Therefore, the case was not sent on to the Court of Appeal.

I know that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I cannot comment on an individual case. It is, of course, a matter for magistrates and judges to sentence offenders on the facts of each case and to do so within the maximum limits that are laid down by Parliament. However, it may be helpful if I briefly make reference to the Court of Appeal guideline on causing death by dangerous driving, which was issued on 3 April 2003 and was based on the advice of the sentencing advisory panel after wide consultation. It suggests as a starting point a sentence of six years' imprisonment or more for cases involving the most serious culpability.

Hon. Members and their constituents will take their own view about the appropriateness of that guideline. As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham accepted, in this particular case account would have been taken of the driver's guilty plea and the sentence was within the maximum limit of 10 years. Although I recognise that no sentence can address the anguish of bereaved families, we have since increased the penalty for causing death by dangerous driving to 14 years. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that. That is the highest maximum penalty for any type of offence, save the most serious, where the maximum is a life sentence. The higher maximum penalty now available might well have led to a more severe sentence in this dreadful case.

The increase arose from the concerns that were expressed during the road traffic penalties review, which reported in July 2002. It became apparent that there was a good deal of concern about the framework for the more serious bad driving offences and the adequacy of the maximum penalties in dealing with offenders who drive badly and cause death and injury on the roads. As a consequence of the review, the maximum penalty for causing death by dangerous driving was increased and the penalty for causing death by careless driving while under the influence of alcohol or drugs was also increased from 10 to 14 years. Aggravated vehicle taking where a death occurs was increased from five to 14 years' imprisonment. The new maximum penalties for those offences were introduced in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and applied to all offences that are committed on or after 23 February.

In announcing the increased penalties for the most serious driving offences, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary underlined our position that dangerous drivers who kill should be properly punished. The devastation that they can cause is immeasurable not only for victims' families but whole communities. Apart from the specific offences for bad driving, manslaughter can be charged in certain cases, for which the penalty is life imprisonment. For that offence the standard of proof is necessarily high in view of the penalty available. In relation to bad driving, manslaughter is not often used, but where it is charged it is mainly used where a person intended to cause harm, for example by deliberately driving into someone.

Under the Criminal Justice Act, we also introduced extended sentences and a sentence of imprisonment for public protection for specified violent offences, which can include the most serious driving offences where the court considers that the offender poses a significant risk of serious harm to the public. The reforms under the 2003 Act are designed to modernise and rebalance the criminal justice system in favour of victims, witnesses and communities.

In the debate on the clauses relating to causing death by bad driving, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said:

> "It is very important that the voices of victims and their families should be heard. There have been the most terrible occasions on which families have been unable to come to terms with what has happened for the rest of their lives and believe that they have not been listened to and that their voices go unheeded. We need to find ways of addressing that." —[Official Report, 20 May 2003; Vol. 405, c. 876.]

This Adjournment debate is, of course, one such occasion for hearing those public concerns. I want to reassure all hon. Members present that we will take careful note of what has been said today, of the strength of public feeling caused by such tragic cases and of the issues they raise. I join the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham in congratulating the McCabe family on the huge campaign that they have led over the past very sad 12 months and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the size of the petition that he presented yesterday to Parliament.

We have ensured that the law provides for the most severe penalties in cases where bad driving has led to a death on the road. For the offence of causing death by dangerous driving, it is necessary to prove that the standard of driving fell far below that of a reasonable and competent driver. If the manner of driving is simply lower than that which is expected, the appropriate charge will be careless driving. It is the behaviour of the driver rather than the consequences that is the deciding factor in determining the appropriate offence to charge.

Where a death has occurred it is especially important that offenders are brought to justice, but as the law stands death does not by itself turn an incident into careless driving or turn careless driving into dangerous driving. Offences such as driving without a licence or insurance are punishable with a fine, penalty points and possible disqualification from driving. The fact that a death has occurred can be taken into account by the court when sentencing, but the court will be limited by the maximum penalty available for those offences. There is no culpability for any consequences resulting from driving with no licence or insurance built into the offence. Those penalties can and do seem insignificant when, as sometimes happens, drivers go on to be involved in a fatal road incident. We fully recognise the anguish and grief of families and friends who lose loved ones in those circumstances.

I had a case in my constituency three years ago in which a 12-year-old boy, Geoffrey Foy, was killed in a road traffic accident involving a driver who had no licence or insurance and who was speeding. The offender received only a fine, which made the tragedy all the harder for the family and, indeed, the wider community to bear.

The Government take a serious view of people who drive without insurance cover. Figures show—the hon. Gentleman highlighted some of them—that antisocial drivers are 10 times more likely to have been convicted of drink-driving, six times more likely to have been convicted of driving an unsafe vehicle and three times more likely to have been convicted of driving without due care and attention. That is why we have announced a tough new approach to target the estimated 1 million motorists on our roads who drive without insurance.

[Paul Goggins]

The Department for Transport plans to introduce as soon as possible a provision that will enable the police to seize and, in appropriate cases, destroy a vehicle being driven by someone not fulfilling the requirement to be insured against third-party risk. Such vehicles will be released only on production of insurance documentation and payment of removal and storage charges.

Uninsured drivers add about £30 on average to the annual premium of honest motorists and are more likely to be involved in road traffic accidents, to be non-compliant with other road traffic requirements and obligations, and to be involved in other criminal activity. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Greenaway report. I am glad that he did so. That piece of work, which was commissioned by the Department for Transport, was published in August and made 20 recommendations. The Government have accepted the majority of the recommendations and are looking at them closely to see how and when it will be possible to implement them. I will be happy to ensure that we write to the hon. Gentleman to keep him up to date on that.

The Government are also increasing police powers to use new technology in order to make detection and enforcement more effective. A powerful new tool—again, the hon. Gentleman mentioned this—is the extended use by the police of automatic number plate recognition, or ANPR. It enables the police easily and immediately to check passing vehicles against entries on the police national computer and other databases. They can then take action as appropriate in respect of drivers who may be of interest for some offence, including that of having no insurance.

To make the use of ANPR even more effective for tackling the offence, the Government have introduced a fixed penalty of £200 as an alternative to prosecution. It is much higher than other fixed penalties and enables the police to enforce the offence on the spot, at the roadside, with an immediate impact on the offender. Of course, the police still retain the discretion to seek a prosecution if they consider that to be the more appropriate course of action, and prosecution is automatic if action is taken in respect of a second or subsequent offence.

The use of ANPR is resulting in much more rigorous enforcement, with more offenders being caught and dealt with. As ANPR usage develops further, motorists will find it increasingly difficult to drive uninsured vehicles without their being detected. Detection will largely be automatic and will no longer require the time and vigilance of individual police officers.

We plan to legislate at an early opportunity to strengthen enforcement still further by improving the information available from ANPR. To assist enforcement, the Government fully supported the Association of British Insurers in the setting up of the motor insurance database, which went live in July 2001. The database makes checking insurance a much simpler and more effective operation by giving police officers immediate access to information about insurance policies at the roadside. Police inquiries to the database are running at about 25,000 a day.

Finally, I want to mention the current review of all bad driving offences that is being led by the Home Office. We must ensure that the criminal law provides a comprehensive and clear framework for addressing bad driving and its all too often appalling consequences. We are aware of the strength of feeling generated by difficult cases such as the one outlined by the hon. Gentleman. The review will be followed by a public consultation exercise, and we shall listen carefully to all responses to the consultation paper on this area of the law. Work is ongoing on the detail of the paper, which will be published as soon as possible. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and others present today will contribute to that consultation as and when they are able to do so.

Wind Turbines (Workington)

4 pm

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to have this debate. I am proud and privileged to represent what is probably—arguably, certainly—the most beautiful constituency in the country. It has six lakes, including Loweswater, Crummock, Buttermere, Bassenthwaite, Derwentwater and Thirlmere, and some of the highest mountains in England, including Skiddaw and the foothills of Helvellyn. Artists and poets, for example Wordsworth, have spent time waxing lyrical about the beauties of the area.

It is not just the lakes. The Solway coast is also spectacularly beautiful. It has fantastic sunsets. One can stand on the coast and look at the Scottish mountains across the firth and turn round and look at the English mountains on the other side. We have one of the few sites where there are red squirrels and the only two breeding ospreys anywhere in England. There is a world heritage site just to the north at Hadrian's wall. The Lake District national park has also applied for world heritage designation. So I hope that hon. Members realise that we are talking about one of the most beautiful places not only in this country, but in the world.

The coastal scenery that I mentioned also includes nationally designated areas of outstanding natural beauty. There are areas of special scientific interest running along the coast. It is that beauty that brings more than 2.5 million visitors a year to that area alone. Those visitors support about 5,000 jobs and bring about £209 million into the local economy. It is a spectacular area and tourism is being developed not only because of the Lake district, but because of the beauty of the coastal strip.

So people are surprised that, at a time when we are trying to develop tourism—there are brand new big brown signs saying, "Welcome to Cumbria" and so on—there are so many planning applications for wind turbines. Many of the sites are close to the national park, and many others are close to, if not part of, areas of outstanding natural beauty. It is not as though we do not have wind turbines already. In a 3 km radius from my hometown, Workington, there are about 36 wind turbines. That is a fair number in a relatively small area. As I said, constituents find it difficult to match the idea of tourism development and economic regeneration with wind turbines sprouting up along the coastline.

Thus far, the only guidance that we have, or seem to have, is planning policy statement 22, published in August 2004. Taken in isolation, that does not provide the clarity that is required. A policy vacuum exists in which local planners are asked to operate without the tools required to do their job properly. I think that the Department acknowledges that. What we are asking for, and what I hope is being developed for publication soon, is a set of guidelines that sits alongside that policy document.

I have other comments on that issue. PPS22 fails to acknowledge the necessity for buffer zones. If we simply acknowledge that the Lake District national park and areas of outstanding natural beauty need to be protected, we could still end up with a ring of wind turbines around the national park. In those terms, that would be okay, because those turbines would not be in the national park. Is anyone going to tell me that, if they were to walk up Sca Fell or Scafell Pike, or climb Great Gable or Red Pike, seeing wind turbines between them and the sea—or, when on the coast, seeing wind turbines between them and the Lake district—would not have a detrimental effect on the area and on its value as a tourist attraction? I think that about 45 per cent. of all jobs in Cumbria involve the tourist industry and up to 15 million tourists come to that part of the world every year.

There has also been no mention from central Government of area-based targets. I am proud that the UK is leading the world on Kyoto, but why do we not break down the treaty targets for renewable energy production into manageable chunks for different geographical areas? Failure to do so may leave areas such as my constituency, which has an obvious abundance of hills and wind, exposed to the actions of a series of power companies, which will say, "This is a nice area. Let's stick up some wind turbines."

We all recognise that we should encourage renewable energy. This country's chief scientific adviser has said that climate change is probably a greater danger to the planet than terrorism. We must heed that warning and ensure that we continue our policy of developing renewable energy. Having placed my support for renewables clearly on the record, however, I want to draw attention to a number of other issues.

If we get this wrong and start to put up wind turbines in inappropriate places—there are planning applications with Allerdale borough council, which covers my area, for turbines in very unsuitable areas—people will be turned against the concept of renewables and wind turbines in particular. In the rush to get turbines going because we must meet certain targets, if we put them in the wrong place, people will say, "They are horrible, hideous and terrible, and we do not want them at any cost." That would cause great damage to the renewable energy debate and we should avoid it.

That turn-off effect would be most profound in the areas that suffer most greatly from environmental degradation caused by badly planned wind turbine development, such as my constituency. The irony is that in my constituency, which has a proud industrial heritage, construction of wind turbines seems a forward-thinking way of carrying forward that industrial heritage, but as yet, we see no benefit to the area.

I have made clear the grave consequences of badly thought-out development, and I want to return to my earlier theme of the guidance that I want from the Government and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and how badly planned development can be avoided.

I have already discussed the need for area-based renewable energy targets. I believe that such a system operates successfully in Wales. I argue that that is an example of how devolved government can, first, provide policy solutions better tailored to local needs and, secondly, act as a catalyst for policy improvement elsewhere. I mean quite simply that those in Wales are doing it and it is working for them, so why cannot England have it?

[Tony Cunningham]

In a situation of this complexity, local feeling is running extremely high. A planning application was turned down by Allerdale planning authority last week or the week before. Hundreds of people turned up at the planning meeting. When the industry is inexperienced and seems at times to be champing at the bit to extend production and the Government are rightly eager to maximise renewable energy production, the policy vacuum needs to be filled as soon as possible. Planning decisions are rightly taken by democratically elected local representatives who are in touch with the needs of the locality, but the parameters of action must be decided centrally, and I hope that that will soon be the case for wind turbines.

Housing is a local level policy area and the local authority develops its own plan for where houses should go and so on. Search areas are another aspect that we should look at. I make that remark because a group of people came to see me which, like all such groups, started by saying, "We are not against renewable energy or wind turbines, but . . . " Basically, those people were talking about planners being given the right, duty and obligation to sit down and decide with the local community where the best sites were. There are brownfield sites, industrial sites and other sites that currently exist where local people may give acceptance. There is no problem with those sites, but it is this attitude of "No, no; we can't have search areas or say where companies should come and place wind turbines" that is the problem. We simply allow companies to put in a planning application, and as I said, a couple of developments have damaged the image of wind turbines in a great stretch of my constituency because they are totally inappropriate.

My other fear relates to the inspectorate. I would like to see a great deal more consistency concerning the inspectors. When two applications were made not too long ago, one inspector said, "This area has high ground, it is an area of natural beauty. We don't want wind turbines there." Another inspector came along to a different site and said, "It is on high ground, and it is an area of natural beauty. The wind turbines will enhance the geography of the area." Hang on—we cannot have both views. Such subjective views create the fear that, regardless of what local councils decide, an inspector will come from London, Bristol or somewhere and say, "We've considered the matter, but the Government want as many wind farms as possible, so one will be allowed." We cannot accept that position.

Just to prove that I am in favour of renewables, I point out that I wish that we could develop more offshore wind turbines. One site is being constructed at the moment a few miles away from the coast of my constituency. It has raised some controversy, but I would pose the following questions to you. This particular site, Robin Rigg, is in Scottish waters, but the electricity will come ashore in my constituency at a small village called Flimby. Whose electricity is it? Is it Scottish or English? Who gets the credit for it: Scotland or us?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I am the wrong Chairman to answer that question.

Tony Cunningham: Those questions are an interesting point when we are considering the matter of targets.

I would like to conclude so that the Minister has ample time to answer. I took part in a Radio Cumbria interview last night on the issue of wind turbines in the area. The gentleman interviewing me started by saying, "Mr. Cunningham, all this is really about is common sense, isn't it?" He is right. It is only about common sense, and if we can have a common-sense approach where we designate areas appropriate for wind turbines, we shall have renewable energy, but be able to protect areas of outstanding natural beauty, areas of special scientific interest and areas that are special as far as wildlife and archaeology are concerned. I hope to hear from the Minister that there will be a common-sense approach and that we shall have that balance, so we can make some progress.

4.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham) for raising the issue of planning for wind farms in his constituency. I know that it is a matter of considerable interest to his constituents and to people in many parts of the country. He has spoken eloquently this afternoon about the concerns of his constituents and has put his case very powerfully, which is a credit to him in his role as constituency MP.

I would just like to make a point about the area that I am at liberty to cover. We know that wind farms might be located both onshore and offshore, but the planning system deals only with onshore sites. I shall say something later about my hon. Friend's point concerning the offshore site providing electricity that arrives on his shore. The development of wind farms offshore as a technical point is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry rather than the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

I would like to stand back from the detail of the specifics of wind farms in my hon. Friend's constituency and paint a broader picture of the policy background to the debate. I was glad to hear him say at the beginning of his contribution that it is important that we do what we can to reduce carbon dioxide emissions and maintain reliable and competitive energy supplies. The development of renewable energy, plus improvement in energy efficiency and the development of combined heat and power, will make a vital contribution to the aims that we both share.

The energy White Paper "Our energy future—creating a low carbon economy" sets a target to generate 10 per cent. of the country's electricity from renewable energy sources by 2010 and to double that figure to 20 per cent. by 2020. It suggests that more renewable energy will be needed beyond that if we are to meet the aim of cutting carbon dioxide emissions by 60 per cent. by 2050. We have a shared agreement on that ambition because of the importance of climate change and the impact of global warming.

Tony Cunningham: I am pleased that the Minister mentioned energy conservation. A constituent of mine said recently that if every household in my constituency were given energy-saving bulbs, more electricity would be conserved than would be generated by hundreds of wind farms. I am not sure of the science, but I hope that point emphasises that energy conservation is as important as creating more electricity.

Phil Hope: I am not able to confirm the details of statistics concerning light bulbs, but it is absolutely right to say that the way we will arrive at a successful, sustainable energy efficiency policy regarding carbon dioxide emissions will be based on a combination of activities, one of which is energy efficiency.

In the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister we have responsibility for the decent homes standard, which is improving the quality of thermal comfort and aiding energy efficiency. I am also the Minister responsible for putting in place building regulations for new build and existing building stock, so we can bear down on building regulations to reduce the carbon output of building. My hon. Friend is right to suggest that there is more than one way to do this, but it is the combination of factors that add up to the ambitious target that I was describing earlier.

On renewable energy in particular—I will deal with wind farms in a moment—as my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, we made it clear in planning policy statement 22, which we published in August, that increased development of renewable energy resources is a vital part of the target achievement if we are to deliver on the commitment on climate change and renewable energy. Positive planning, as well as common sense, which facilitates renewable energy developments, can contribute to all four elements of our renewable energy strategy.

So that we see this in context, I will outline the four elements to the renewable energy strategy. First is social progress, which my hon. Friend has just described. It means contributing to energy needs, ensuring all homes are adequately and affordably heated and providing new sources of energy in remote areas. Secondly, effective environmental protection is achieved by reducing emissions of greenhouse gases and thereby helping to limit the effects of climate change. Third is the prudent use of resources and reducing reliance on diminishing supplies of fossil fuels. Fourthly, economic growth and employment can be delivered through the creation of jobs directly related to specific developments and the development of new technologies. My hon. Friend mentioned that that is one of the benefits of the new technologies, including wind turbines and much else. They are bringing jobs to this country as we invest in the ability of manufacturing to produce new forms of technology.

I also stress that although we are debating wind farms, renewable energy covers other important sources of energy such as water flow, tides, the sun and biomass. Wind energy has a very important contribution to make in meeting the Government's targets, but other renewable energy strategies and technologies have a part to play, too. We believe most strongly that renewable energy developments are capable of being accommodated throughout the country where the technology is viable and where environmental, social and economic impacts can be addressed satisfactorily. The crux is to look at all three of those and see how they work.

As for wind farms, I am sure my hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment on the merits of any particular proposal for a wind farm which is the subject of planning applications by Allerdale borough council, or anybody else, because of the quasi-judicial role that we in the ODPM play. However, I am aware of his concerns. If an application is rejected by a local planning authority, it is for the applicants to consider whether to exercise right of appeal to the Deputy Prime Minister, which takes me on to the point about inspectors and how that system works.

My hon. Friend raised a particular concern about consistency. Let me emphasise that, in determining appeals, planning inspectors act in a quasi-judicial role. They do so under delegated powers for the Deputy Prime Minister. I believe that the integrity, impartiality and fairness with which each appeal is handled are widely acknowledged, although I have heard my hon. Friend's points loud and clear. I assure him that the planning inspectorate has a well-developed training programme whereby inspectors are kept fully abreast of national policy development. However, it is of course for individual inspectors to weigh all the evidence presented by the parties in respect of any particular appeal before reaching a decision to allow or dismiss that appeal. Importantly, each case must be determined—that is the legal framework—on its individual merits. However, in doing so, inspectors take into account planning guidance.

PPS22 on renewable energy makes it clear that we want to work with regional and local bodies to deliver the Government's objectives around renewable energy. Therefore, regional and local plans should contain policies designed to promote and encourage, rather than to restrict, the development of renewable energy resources. The current published regional planning guidance—we now call it a regional spatial strategy or an RSS because the jargon changes—is the subject of a partial review. I was not sure whether my hon. Friend was aware of that.

The draft revision has been published by the North West regional assembly for public consultation, and it will be debated at an examination in public in November. The Deputy Prime Minister will consider the proposals contained in that draft in the light of the report on that examination in public and other representations he has received, and he will then publish his decision in due course.

Importantly, the published draft proposes targets for the region and for sub-regional areas. It proposes that Cumbria comprises a sub-region and a target for the county, and it also sets targets for other parts of the region. The critical point is that it sets out a number of criteria-based policies against which proposed wind farm developments might be assessed. This is an important part of the process. My hon. Friend's Adjournment debate is timely: the consultation period on the draft review ended in July so it is too late to make representations on that, but it is open to interested parties—which might include himself or others who have been making representations to him—to submit a short written statement to the panel conducting the examination in public by 1 November on any of the issues that it has been asked to address. That list of issues is being publicised this week and it includes a number of questions about policies relating to renewable energy, so there is an opportunity for my hon. Friend and those whom he is seeking to represent to put their case.

My hon. Friend eloquently described the beauty of his consistency. I know it well; I have walked those hills and dales on many occasions. He is lucky, but other MPs might want to challenge his assertion that it is the most beautiful constituency in the country. I would not make that claim for Corby, but other constituencies might want to vie for that title. However, he is right to say that many parts of his constituency are subject to being nationally and internationally designated areas: they include the Solway firth area of natural beauty, the Hadrian's wall military zone world heritage site and the Lake District national park, which is also proposed as a world heritage site.

The Government's advice on the handling of planning applications where the development proposed might affect internationally or nationally designated sites is clearly set out in PPS22. Generally speaking, proposals for renewable energy development need to be considered carefully in such areas of national or international importance for landscape and for nature conservation and wildlife, and they should be granted planning permission only where the criteria set out in PPS22 and other guidance and legislation are met.

My hon. Friend mentioned red squirrels and other forms of wildlife that are almost exclusive to his constituency. In assessing any proposals put to councils that might affect a designated site, local planning authorities should have regard to the more detailed guidance in respect of European nature conservation sites currently set out in planning policy guidance 9 on nature conservation. That provides guidance on how the Government's policies for the conservation of our natural heritage are to be reflected in planning.

For internationally designated sites, planning permission for renewable energy developments likely to have an adverse impact on the site should be granted only once an assessment has shown that the integrity of the site would not be adversely affected. If the development would have an adverse impact, it should be allowed only very exceptionally. Similar considerations apply to nationally designated sites, so the key issue is to seek to ensure that the qualities for which an area has been designated will not be compromised.

Tony Cunningham: The point that I was trying to make—I touched on it when I mentioned buffer zones—is that we can protect the site, but if we put wind turbines all around it, the effect is that the area is blighted, regardless of the fact that the wind turbines are not on it. On PPS22, I think I am accurate in saying that, strictly speaking, the policy protects the green belt around certain areas in a more stringent way than it does areas of outstanding natural beauty. Surely that is wrong.

Phil Hope: I was coming specifically to that point. With regard to land adjacent to the boundaries of particular designated sites, I regret to have to tell my hon. Friend that it is our view that local authorities should not seek to introduce buffer zones. We do not want lines on maps showing, for example, that no wind farms would be permitted within 10 km or 20 km, or some other distance, of the boundary of a national park. However, that does not leave things in the situation that he described. Instead of taking the approach that he is promoting, we believe that it is for the local planning authorities to introduce, through their local development plan—this is the critical point in the planning process—appropriate criteria-based policies against which they and prospective developers making planning applications might assess the suitability or otherwise of specific sites.

Around and indeed within nationally designated sites, some areas of land will of course be more sensitive than others to change that might impact on the designated area, so the development plan should provide the tools to help to identify those areas. The local authorities for those areas can address the type of concern that my hon. Friend puts forward through the local development plan and the criteria-based policies within it.

Let me stress that PPS22 sets out firm policies to ensure that our most valued landscapes, such as national parks, and our most environmentally sensitive areas are protected from large-scale renewable energy developments that have detrimental impacts. It has been said, and we must recognise, that some smaller-scale renewable energy developments can be accommodated in such areas without serious environmental detriment to those areas, but again we look to the local planning authorities, through their local development plan, to ensure that the right criteria-based policies are put in place to secure the right results.

I want to mention the companion guide to which my hon. Friend referred. PPS22 moves on from the old PPG system. It is designed to be a short and succinct statement of the Government's policies on renewable energy. It is not a catalogue of policies and guidance. Instead, we are producing in addition a companion guide to PPS22 that will provide more detailed descriptions of different technologies, as well as examples of good practice in development plans and developments. That has been produced through consultation. It will be published in the very near future, and I believe that it will provide the kind of help and support that my hon. Friend sought in his contribution. It will be a valuable tool.

To sum up, we are firmly of the view that the development of renewable energy, including the harnessing of wind energy, has an important part to play in reducing carbon dioxide emissions. We believe it right to support and encourage the development of wind farms, but we must do so in a way that is subject to the environmental, social and economic impacts being addressed satisfactorily. I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing the issue to the attention of the Chamber today, and I urge him and his colleagues to consider the examination in public of the regional spatial strategy as a further approach that he might take in pursuing his aims.

Question put and agreed to.

Struggle Against Slavery

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before we commence, I wish to alert the Chamber to the fact that we are expecting a Division to be called in about 19 minutes, at which point I shall suspend the sitting for 15 minutes.

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I am proud to initiate the debate to demonstrate Britain's support for the United Nations international year to commemorate the struggle against slavery and its abolition. In holding the debate, we acknowledge the significance of the UN year in encouraging us to tackle modern forms of slavery, to open up a discussion about how most usefully to mark the 200th anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade in Britain in 2007 and to ensure that we learn the lessons of the past.

In its publication this year to commemorate the struggle against slavery and its abolition, the UN General Assembly stated explicitly that its intention was to draw attention to the historic struggle. At the launch, the director general of UNESCO said:

> "It was a struggle for humanity. As such, it is not over because the struggle to ensure the full enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms by everyone is far from complete. We must ensure that this international year focuses on more than the negativities and sorrows of the past. It must also be used positively to stimulate the building of tolerance, peace and mutual understanding among people of different cultures, religions and traditions."

In her speech to the World Congress against Racism in Durban, Baroness Amos described the acts of acknowledgment, regret and condemnation inherent in the year as allowing us to move forward in the spirit of hope and giving us the basis on which to continue to tackle contemporary problems. Raising understanding and awareness of slavery issues and Britain's part in the slave trade, its abolition and how we can work to eradicate modern-day slavery is the best way to move forward, and the debate is part of the start of that process.

We know that Britain was a key partner in the slave trade. Abolition came about after many years as a result of one of the world's first mass human rights movements. Britain played a key part in the struggle to end the abhorrent practice of slavery. The international year can help us to prepare for the bicentenary three years from now of Parliament passing legislation to abolish the slave trade.

Slavery is a crime against humanity. Slavery and the slave trade were, and are, appalling tragedies in the history of humanity. We talk about the history but, recently, I met the lord mayor of Plymouth, Claude Miller. His great-grandfather was a slave. In just three generations, the family has swapped the chains of slavery for the chains of office. That symbol of hopefulness is one that we must focus on, too. However, the fact that that is such recent history is a powerful reminder.

Slavery has existed in many forms and in many civilisations throughout the world and across the centuries, but the transatlantic slave trade was different. It was one of the first examples of institutionalised racism. No other slave system was so regulated and so determined by the matter of race. No other system moved so many people. Millions of African people were removed forcibly from their homes and communities and taken in the most inhuman conditions to work as slaves on cotton, sugar and tobacco plantations. The basis of that horrific trade was economic. People were seen as nothing more than units of labour condemned to brutal and often short lives.

Everyone in the Chamber will know of the long struggle and ultimate success of the campaign of the abolitionists in the United Kingdom and of the strong Christian commitment that underlay the work of people such as Thomas Clarkson, who travelled thousands of miles collecting information, often at personal risk, to support the abolition of the trade, Granville Sharp, who was instrumental in using the law and, of course, William Wilberforce, the politician, evangelist and philanthropist. When first asked to use his influence to bring an end to the slave trade, he replied:

> "I feel the great importance of the subject and I think myself unequal to the task allotted to me."

We are grateful that he took a different view and went on to commit most of his parliamentary career to that effort.

It is just as important to remember that alongside the white philanthropists there were many Africans who displayed great courage and heroism in bringing the slave trade to an end. From the 1730s, when it was reported that a > "wind of freedom was blowing on the Caribbean", to the Haitian revolution, the enslaved peoples resisted and rebelled. Olaudah Equiano was a key participant in the campaign to end the trade, speaking at meetings and publishing a book about his experiences as a slave, which helped to change public opinion. Individuals such as Jonathan Strong and James Somerset, who used the British courts to secure their freedom, also contributed.

Now, as then, Africans need their indigenous leaders, people such as Nelson Mandela and Desmond Tutu, to help them to tackle contemporary problems of poverty, HIV/AIDS and poor education, from which millions in Africa suffer. They also need external champions, such as the G8 countries, to respond to what our Prime Minister has called a > "scar on the conscience of the world."

He has launched the Commission for Africa in order to help to drive forward Africa's development and increase its prosperity. Early in 2005, the commission will produce a comprehensive plan, which will show how the international community can support African development. That plan, which will show what Africa needs, and what has held back progress in the past, will help us to turn international attention on Africa into international action to support Africa.

[Fiona Mactaggart]

The UK is showing the way. Since 1997 we have more than doubled our aid budget. As a result, we will be able to increase direct aid for Africa to £1 billion next year. That will enable us to lift one million people in Africa permanently out of poverty each year.

It is a sad fact that, despite being outlawed internationally, slavery is still widespread. As many as 27 million people are estimated to be living in conditions of slavery—human trafficking, forced and bonded labour or child labour. Wherever, whenever and in whatever form slavery occurs, we unreservedly condemn it, and are committed to eliminating it. As well as ratifying the key international legal instruments that outlaw slavery, we are taking positive practical steps to bring slavery to an end. For example, our embassy in Kathmandu, Nepal, provided support over three years to a charity for the production and airing of Khyala Radio, an awareness programme to make former bonded labourers aware of their legal rights and to help them to set up activity groups.

We are also working to combat trafficking, providing funds and expertise in Asia and west Africa, the Balkans and China. We are training police officers, providing direct support to women's groups and working with the International Labour Organisation to eliminate child labour. For example, human rights groups have criticised the United Arab Emirates for using young boys, some reportedly as young as four years old, as camel jockeys. They are recruited from South Asia—many of them, reportedly, against their will—by organised people traffickers in their home countries. We are funding a project by Anti-Slavery International to exert pressure in countries where camel racing takes place, and also to help non-governmental organisations in the countries the children come from to co-ordinate their lobbying against the practice.

At home, we have a comprehensive programme to combat trafficking. It includes legislation, enforcement, prevention and, very importantly, support for victims. The Sexual Offences Act 2003, which came into force on 1 May this year, introduces new, wide-ranging offences covering trafficking into, out of or within the United Kingdom for any form of sexual offence, and carries a 14-year maximum penalty. A new offence, trafficking for exploitation, which includes trafficking for forced labour and the removal of organs, is included in the Asylum and Immigration Act 2004 and will also carry a 14-year maximum penalty.

In March 2000, a multi-agency Government taskforce, Reflex, chaired by the National Crime Squad, was set up to deal with organised immigration crime. Its remit is to co-ordinate the enforcement response to such issues, both nationally and internationally, and to develop the intelligence and strategic planning to underpin that. Between April 2003 and April 2004, Reflex resulted in 38 disruptions and 38 convictions for organised immigration crime. That figure includes those who are involved in human trafficking as well as people smuggling and related activities. To be truly effective, however, the Government have recognised that they must tackle trafficking at source.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I have a great deal of sympathy for what the Minister says, but surely the one major step with which the Government have so far refused to align themselves is a common European policy that would dictate control over these issues, including people trafficking and organ trafficking. The Government's failure to support the Council of Europe's plans to persuade its member states to adopt such a policy has been remarkable. Will the Minister explain the Government's position?

Fiona Mactaggart: I am anxious that we might be straying into matters that are partly being discussed in the Chamber, but I will return to that.

As I said, to be truly effective, the Government have recognised that they must tackle trafficking at source. We are therefore funding Anti-Slavery International to raise awareness of the abuses suffered by the victims of trafficking and to take remedial action in west Africa. We have also given £3 million to the International Labour Organisation's international programme on the elimination of child labour in the far east. This involves a number of inter-linked interventions to raise awareness and prevent trafficking, and to withdraw women and children from labour exploitation and reintegrate them back into their own or new communities.

Reflex has funded a helpline in Romania to help detect and prevent trafficking, and the Home Office is funding the Poppy Project in London, which provides safe accommodation and a range of support services for up to 25 female victims who have been trafficked into prostitution. This is just part of our national, international and global efforts to deal with trafficking, and I am glad to say that there will be a debate this week, following a television programme about trafficking in the United Kingdom.

I mentioned earlier that 2007 has a particular resonance for us in the UK, as it is the bicentenary of the abolition of the slave trade. I want to use this opportunity today to begin a debate about how we, as a country, should mark this anniversary, and how we can improve awareness and understanding of Britain's involvement in the transatlantic slave trade, including our role in its abolition.

My ministerial colleagues at the Department for Education and Skills share our concern that slavery and all black history is taught sensitively in schools. There is plenty of scope within the national curriculum for teaching black history, but one of the constraints that teachers face is unfamiliarity with the resources available. They can also feel unprepared to handle some of the difficult and challenging issues that arise. We want to support teachers through this. With the Department for Education and Skills, we are exploring how museums, such as the British Empire and Commonwealth Museum in Bristol, might provide educational resources that give a full picture of the Commonwealth and that celebrate the diversity of Britain's multi racial community.

However, education happens in communities as well as in institutions, and to this day, many people descended from enslaved Africans feel that they are denied their history, culture and sense of identity. This United Nations year is an attempt to rectify that by offering them recognition and respect. On 23 August—the international day for the remembrance of the slave trade and its abolition—I participated in an event that was organised by Rendezvous of Victory and part-funded by my Department. People there spoke passionately about the slave trade, its legacy, and contemporary issues such as prejudice, racism and disadvantage. I hope that in 2007 we tap into the knowledge, passion and energy of such groups and individuals.

I am glad to say that I have been able to discuss some of these plans with the Heritage Lottery Fund, which has already funded several projects relating to the slave trade. These range from a grant of £281,000 to the National Maritime Museum to purchase the Michael Graham-Stewart slavery collection, a grant of £92,000 to Anti-Slavery International to conserve and catalogue over 600 abolitionist tracts and pamphlets, and £25,000 to Merton black educational forum to research and develop teaching and learning resources on key black figures, including abolitionists, who have contributed to British history.

Several heritage and community-based organisations are already discussing possible projects for 2007, and the fund plans to produce an information pack that identifies important heritage sites, collections and resources to help applicants to develop their projects. It also proposes to promote the funding for this event in the media and through activities led by regional and country teams. In museums throughout the country, work is already well under way on developing plans for the bicentenary, including a new slavery gallery in Liverpool and a major exhibition in London.

As Members of Parliament, we have a responsibility to ensure that the bicentenary is effectively commemorated. Repugnance at the slave trade, and the wish to commemorate its abolition, cross party political boundaries, and I invite colleagues from all parties here today to think about how they can encourage their constituents to mark the 200th anniversary.

In holding this debate, I hope that we will begin to raise awareness of Britain's role in the transatlantic slave trade and its abolition. However, we should not be complacent about the prevalence of contemporary slavery or lessen our efforts to combat it. Nearly 200 years on from the abolition of the slave trade, Britain is a diverse society. That is a great source of strength and enriches all our lives. However, people in the black and minority ethnic communities continue to experience racism, discrimination and disadvantage. The world has changed greatly since the 19th century, but some of the issues have not. Although a repeat of the slave trade would never be allowed, we owe it to the descendants of enslaved people to ensure that their human rights are upheld and that our society recognises and celebrates the strength in its diversity.

The Government will soon be launching their community cohesion and race equality strategy, which will establish a cross-Government framework for action to promote inclusive notions of citizenship, identity and belonging, tackle inequality and lack of opportunity, confront racism and extremism, and create cohesive communities. Effective action of that kind is part of our efforts to deliver on the challenge set out by the director general of UNESCO in launching this year of commemoration, when he demanded that it should be not only > "an act of historical solidarity with the victims of a terrible injustice and with those who fought for their freedoms and rights", but

> "an act of re-dedication to the ongoing struggle against all forms of racism, discrimination, xenophobia, intolerance and injustice."

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I am delighted to follow the Minister in this important debate. She will not be surprised to know that I agree strongly with the spirit and the substance of her remarks, and I do not think that there will be too much controversy.

I am delighted that this is the international year in which we seek to commemorate the struggle against slavery. I look forward to the important bicentenary in 2007 and very much welcome the Minister's invitation to take part in the debate about how best to commemorate it. She must know that she will have the full support of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition; indeed, she might even be in Her Majesty's loyal Opposition by then, but we shall see.

I have the honour of representing part of the city of Plymouth, and I thank the Minister for her kind reference to the lord mayor. Claude, who is in his 80s, is an outstanding lord mayor, and I say that even though he is a member of the Labour group in Plymouth. He does a wonderful job for the city and will be thrilled by the Minister's tribute, so I thank her most sincerely for her kind remarks.

This discussion of slavery is not only a useful reminder of how far we have come in understanding and embracing key truths about human dignity, personal freedom and rights but a solemn reminder of how far we have still to travel. It might be helpful if I take a few moments to set out the true nature and extent of the transatlantic slave trade.

It is horrifying to recognise that an estimated 2.1 million slaves were imported into the English colonies in America between 1680 and 1786.

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

3.19 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Streeter: In the 100 years from 1680—in a world with a much smaller population—some 2.1 million slaves were imported for the British colonies in America. In 1790, the British West Indies had a slave population of more than 500,000 people. Between 1650 and 1900, some 10.2 million slaves were shipped to the Americas from Africa, both legally and illegally. Sometimes, when we consider the scale of this atrocity, it almost takes the breath away.

We know that the main use of slaves was as cheap labour on plantations. Some 70 per cent. of all slave labour was used on sugar plantations as part of the triangular Atlantic trade system. As we know from many historical records, this precious human cargo was treated cruelly. People were shipped in the most cramped and inhumane conditions, and lived out their lives in servitude and oppression.

I have never been one for dramatic apologies about everything in our past—apologising for the last 2,000 years of British history—but in this case there must be an acknowledgement of the part that this country played in this appalling atrocity; that what we did was wrong; that it is a scar on our history and is only partially redeemed by the fact that we led the way in the abolition of the trade and then the abolition of slavery.

As we know, in 1807 a Bill was passed making it unlawful to import slaves into Britain, but it did not include the rest of the British empire; the Slavery Abolition Act 1833 included all parts. The British Government subsequently put pressure on their European neighbours. France abolished slavery in 1848 and Spain followed shortly after, so at last we gave a lead.

How did this movement for abolition come about? It was, as the Minister has already said, one of the earliest examples of a mass movement for human rights, and many slaves deserve great credit for taking part and shifting public opinion. As has already been mentioned, Mr. Equiano's graphic, first-hand accounts of his abduction and life of slavery, which were published in 1789 in London, were a massive spur to the people of this country to wake up. Also, it was an issue whose time had come. It is often the case that we can take something for granted and suddenly wake up and think, "How on earth have we allowed that to happen for so long?"

As is so often the case, although there was a growing groan from the bowels of the British people, it still required leadership to shift the status quo. We are indebted, as the Minister said, to a group of people in and around Westminster, including my personal political hero, William Wilberforce. He, along with many others including Thomas Clarkson and Granville Sharp, worked hard for many years, shifted public opinion, brought campaigns to the House of Commons and introduced Bills of Parliament, many of which were rejected. They persevered until ultimately they triumphed. That was to their credit.

It has already been said that the job is not yet done. It is shocking to discover what is happening. I must be frank and say that in preparing for this debate and starting to talk to some of the non-governmental organisations, particularly Anti-Slavery International, which I found extremely helpful and very knowledgeable, I was genuinely shocked by the scale of the problem still going on in the world today. The Morecambe bay tragedy some months ago was a wake-up call to this country. I did not know that people were being subjected to such oppression and injustice in this country. It was certainly a wake-up call for me. Then I learned that this sort of thing is happening more and more. I read yesterday that 1,400 women in 2000 were trafficked into this country for prostitution.

Forced and bonded labour, the worst forms of child labour, child soldiers and early and forced marriage are all modern forms of slavery. The job is not done and we need to do more. Many colleagues in the Chamber have fought tirelessly on this issue for many years.

It is estimated that 300,000 children are fighting in armies in more than 35 countries around the world. I have read that 20 million people are held in bonded labour around the world, especially in India, Pakistan and Nepal. The US State Department estimates that 800,000 to 900,000 people—nearly 1 million—are trafficked annually across borders. UNICEF estimated in 2003 that human trafficking nets profits of $7 billion to $10 billion a year worldwide. No wonder that the pressure is so great and the exploitation of people is so merciless.

I have a couple of specific examples about which I learned this week. Indonesians who want to work outside their country have to apply for work through Government-sanctioned recruitment agencies and are charged extortionate agency fees, which they must pay back while they work in host countries. This creates a system of debt bondage as workers are forced to pay almost all their monthly earnings to their agency. That is a form of 21st-century slavery.

The Minister has already mentioned the exploitation in the UAE of young boys, normally from the Asian sub-continent. Apparently, children, often as young as four, are being coerced into becoming camel jockeys, even though it is illegal in the UAE to work under the age of 15. That also goes on in other Arab countries.

I want to say a few words about human trafficking for two reasons. First, it is one of the worst examples of man's inhumanity to man—normally it is men being inhumane to other people. Secondly, in this globalising world, the pressure in relation to human trafficking will increase and we will have to be at our very best to defeat it. It is rightly called a modern-day slave trade. The traffickers use violence, coercion and deception to take people away from their homes and families, and force them to work against their will. The cockle-pickers in Morecombe bay were an example of that.

People are trafficked both between countries and within their own countries. The trafficking of people is a rapidly growing global problem that affects countries and families in every continent. Those who are trafficked may be forced to work as domestics, in prostitution, as labourers or in many other industries. As a result of its hidden nature, statistics relating to trafficking are impossible to measure accurately. As I have said, some reports estimate that 800,000 to 900,000 people are trafficked across borders every year.

I do not know whether the Minister is planning to speak for a second time, but if she is—and she would have my full support to do so—will she say a little more about the Government's approach to making a Europe-wide response? That has already been asked about.

I am aware of the Council of Europe convention, which is being drafted as we speak. It would be good to hear what progress is being made on it. I would like to learn from the Minister what its impact is likely to be and what the Government's will be. There are many problems that we can address ourselves. I welcome the legislation that the Government have introduced in the past two years to bear down on some of the worst abuses—trafficking, prostitution and so on. What steps are being taken to ensure that both the European Union and the wider family of European countries tackle this growing problem on a collective basis?

I have considered this issue, particularly in the past few days, and concerned myself about what the global solution might be. I believe that we come back to our old friends, the millennium targets relating to international development. As is so often the case, in addition to bearing down on specific examples of injustice and malpractice, this country must continue to advocate meeting those millennium targets and do what it can to reduce poverty and injustice throughout so much of the developing world.

I strongly support the work of the Department for International Development and the increase in its budget over the past few years—I pay tribute to the Government for that. I believe that it is a priority, and something that Wilberforce would have supported. This is a wealthy country and we should be at the cutting edge in bearing down on global poverty, instability and injustice.

If the Minister is going to make a winding-up speech, will she say a little about whether the issue of slavery is at the top of DFID's agenda? Promoting good governance and creating effective international laws, and then having enforcement mechanisms, are all right responses to this problem. Education also has a role in breaking down some of the barriers of prejudice and ignorance, particularly some of the cultural barriers. While we do not want to disturb people's cultural rhythms, some of them lead to some of the practices that have no part in a modern world. I hope that the Minister will be able to comment on whether, in her view, DFID is doing its utmost to place 21st-century slavery at the top of its agenda.

I want to finish by making one more comment. As we have heard, the abolition Bill was finally passed on 26 July 1833. It declared that slavery would be abolished and that the planters would be heavily compensated—a typical British solution. On hearing that the Bill had become law in July 1833, William Wilberforce, who was no longer a Member of Parliament, said:

> "Thank God that I have lived to witness a day in which England is willing to give twenty millions sterling for the abolition of slavery."

That was a huge sum in those days. He died three days later, on 29 July, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His life's work had been achieved. However, the challenge remains for all of us. I want the Minister to know that she has Conservative support in doing what we can to end 21st-century slavery worldwide.

3.30 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): This debate and the atmosphere in which it is being conducted are welcome, and the proposals for a serious commemoration of the 200th anniversary are equally welcome. However, if we can, we have to remove ourselves from the English and European feeling of self-satisfaction that we did a good job for the world 200 years ago. The reality is that Britain and Europe made a vast amount of wealth from the slave trade, and that wealth is still with us.

One way of heading into the commemoration would be to offer a genuine, serious and heartfelt apology for the slave trade, because it is important to make such gestures. Moving on a little, we could talk of reparations for the people who suffered and the countries that suffered because of the slave trade. On an entirely practical level, I suggest that alongside the correctly placed statue to William Wilberforce, we should have a statue to an appropriate leader of one of the slave rebellions. Paul Bogle, from Morant bay in Jamaica, would be a good example, as would Nat Turner from the United States and the many others who died because they stood up for justice for their people against the injustices of the slave trade. That would be an important part of showing that we take this issue seriously and an important element in education for young people in this country and throughout the world.

The slave trade was an act of genocide against black people, who were transported from Africa, and the money made from it ended up largely in the pockets of the wealthy in this country. I advise that one of the source books for this commemoration year should be "Capitalism and Slavery" by the late Eric Williams, which he wrote as an LSE thesis in 1940 or thereabouts. It traces the way in which the English wealthy made money from the Caribbean sugar trade. That wealth can be directly traced to major British companies now, such as Booker, Lloyds bank, Barclays bank and Tate and Lyle. We can go through all the blue chip companies in the City and trace where much of their initial wealth came from. The campaign for reparations is a serious one. I hope that next year we do not just have a one-month commemoration, but end up with some kind of annual commemoration, because that is very important.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) rightly drew attention to the British compromise, which was to support the abolition of the slave trade and then apologise to the slave owners for doing so by giving them £20 million. I do not know what that would equate to today, but it was an absolutely phenomenal amount of money. It would be nice to know what happened to that money and where it is still held. Earlier this year, I was looking through Hansard reports of the early 1800s for a friend who was doing research on escaped slaves living in London. It was fascinating to read the debates. The moral high ground was taken by Wilberforce and a number of other commendable people, but there was also the nakedness of saying, "Well, hang on, if we abolish it, where's the money?" The debate was between the moral high ground and wealth. At no stage was any African person's voice heard in that debate, which was between two strands of political opinion in Europe and did not extend beyond those boundaries.

In this commemoration, we have an opportunity to do a great deal to educate people and understand the way in which British and European colonialism treated people and who the heroes really were. I would add another hero: Toussaint L'Ouverture, the leader of the Haitian revolution, which brought about the first black state in the world. My final book recommendation is "How Europe Underdeveloped Africa" by Walter Rodney. It provides a very interesting description of how the slave trade and subsequent colonialism destabilised all the economic, environmental and social systems in that continent. We ended up with the horrors of the 1884 Congress of Berlin, which drew all the straight lines all over Africa. That is the cause of so many of our current problems.

It is easy to deal with the whole slavery issue as if it were purely an anachronism, but although I wish it were that, it is not. I attend the UN Commission on Human Rights every summer usually, and sometimes for the full session in April and the sub-commission that is held in August. Every year, we go through the debates about these issues. There is a question about how this Parliament persuades our Government to hold to account the international agencies and to promote the international laws that are supposed to be protecting very vulnerable and predominantly young people from slavery—sex slavery, bondage and all kinds of inherent discrimination.

Article 4 of the universal declaration of human rights states:

> "No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms."

We then think of all the other forms that exist.

I also want to quote what Kofi Annan said about child work in March 1999:

> "Child labour has serious consequences that stay with the individual and with society for far longer than the years of childhood. Young workers not only face dangerous working conditions. They face long term physical, intellectual and emotional stress. They face an adulthood of unemployment and illiteracy. Few human rights abuses are so widely condemned, yet"— as he rightly says—

> "so widely unnoticed."

That is what this debate should be about; we should bring to the world's attention what all these things actually mean.

The UN convention on the rights of the child was agreed in 1989. There is a tablet in Hyde park—it was unveiled by the then Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher—that commemorates Britain's adherence to that convention. It stated that children had rights to education, housing, health—and a right to a childhood, which so many of them are denied. However, when we look at the institutions that exist around the world which should be in a position to protect the most vulnerable, we realise their weakness. I would like the UN High Commission for Refugees and the UN High Commission on Human Rights to have far greater power. For the issue of slavery really to be dealt with, we need there to be much tougher rules that the International Labour Organisation can impose.

We should think through what was said about those poor, unfortunate people in Morecombe bay. How did they end up in that bay, other than by a whole process of the grossest exploitation of their rights, the poverty of the environment from which they came and the preparedness of a very large chain of companies in this country to buy cockles that had been picked by people who were being paid what was basically nothing for being in enormous danger? Such cockles were then served up at Wheeler's and other expensive west end restaurants. What would we discover if we were to adjourn this debate and go down to Oxford street to pore over some of the very expensive designer labels there? If we were to trace things back to who actually made those clothes, we would find that child labour, bonded labour or slave labour was producing it. We choose to turn a blind eye to that, and when the companies concerned are challenged on it, they all say, "Well, it was not really us; we bought it from a subcontractor." That is very nice and convenient for them, but it is not much help to the people who are suffering as a result.

I hope that we can do a little more to bring greater powers to the world's institutions that should be dealing with these matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Clarke) tabled early-day motion 945 last year. It dealt with the whole question of child labour and the need to adhere to ILO convention 182 on the exploitation of children.

I also want to talk briefly about institutional or caste discrimination that leads directly to slavery. I must declare an interest in that I am a trustee of the Dalit Solidarity Network. We have had a number of public meetings. The discrimination against Dalit people, commonly known as untouchables, in India and other places—not only in India, but principally there—is serious. It is not merely discrimination; it is a form of slavery and control, which leads to the loss of many lives and livelihoods.

I was in India earlier this year, and I welcomed the Dalit solidarity march, which arrived at the World Social Forum in Mumbai having marched thousands of miles through India to draw attention to the plight of these people. If we were to look at the legal situation in India, and to read the Indian constitution and legal statutes, we would all say, "Fine, they have total protection." Bonded labour is illegal, slavery is illegal, and discrimination on grounds of caste is illegal—but they go on.

At a local level, if one asks any Dalit person what they do when they are threatened, when their children are forced to make carpets and bricks, when they are forced to work in the owner's house and everything that goes with that, they will say, "What can we do?" There is not a court that will be interested in what they have to say; nobody will represent them, yet the constitution offers them that protection. When one looks at the slave trade that exists in other parts of the world, one sees the reality.

When the Department for International Development and the European Union are disbursing aid packages, aid programmes and development programmes, they ensure that those programmes not only reach all people, but that they are disbursed in a way that does not prop up a social, legal or economic system that systematically exploits people or owns such forms of exploitation and slavery.

A brilliant film was shown on BBC 4 last weekend. It was a Russian film, which showed a young girl, living in fairly miserable surroundings in post-Soviet Union St. Petersburg. She was offered the chance to go to Sweden to work. She was abandoned at the airport and told that it would be okay and that someone would meet her. She arrived in Sweden, her passport was taken from her by her new owner, and she became a prostitute.

The final clip of the film shows her jumping off a motorway bridge, attempting suicide. Brilliantly, the film does not say whether she lived or died, but leaves one with that thought. All she had in her mind was a dream of her brother, like the wings of Icarus, coming back to save her. It showed that even in a country such as Sweden or Britain—anywhere in Europe where we think of ourselves as having rights, democratic values, access to justice and all the rest—and throughout the developed world, people are effectively slaves in our society, working as domestic workers, sex slaves or prostitutes.

In the anniversary year coming up, I hope that we will commemorate those people who have died because of the slave trade; that we will talk seriously about reparations for those who have suffered so much and continue to suffer from it; and that we will totally outlaw child labour, exploitation and bonded labour and all the horrors that go with them. If we cannot do that, in the 21st century, what on earth are we about? We allow a world to develop economically, with all the technical abilities that we have, yet we allow the grossest form of denial of people's rights and livelihood to exist. Let us think of the horrors, and of the genius that is wasted in those carpet factories, brick factories and all the other similar places. Then we will see the importance of standing up for the peoples' rights and ensuring that the world's institutions are not the super-powerful World Bank and International Monetary Fund but the super-powerful ILO, the UN High Commission for Refugees and the UN High Commission on Human Rights. Those are the issues that we should consider, and that is the agenda that we should follow.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I start by thanking the Government for making the time available to discuss such an important matter. I also thank the Minister for dwelling on the United Kingdom's role in the slave trade.

In some respects, I should apologise to those in the Public Gallery, because I shall focus principally on contemporary slavery. As my party's spokesman on international development, I believe that we can do something about it. None the less, I take on board the Minister's comments about how we, as Members of Parliament, should think about what role we can play to ensure that the bicentenary is appropriately commemorated. Indeed, as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said, we should commemorate not only Wilberforce but those who might be called slave activists—all those who fought the campaign alongside him.

We know from the events of the past 24 hours how difficult it can be to say sorry, but it is entirely appropriate that we should say sorry for the role that the UK played in the slave trade. We should be frank, open and blunt about it, and I am happy to do so today.

Although we are celebrating the bicentenary of the struggle against slavery and its successful abolition, it gives us the chance to highlight some of the many forms of slavery that exist now, such as bonded labour, child labour, child soldiers and the caste system and how Dalits are affected by it, a subject highlighted by the hon. Gentleman. I intend to press the Minister on what the Government can do to tackle those forms of contemporary slavery.

I shall speak first about bonded labour. Hon. Members will know that that is the selling of a person's labour or services, or those of the family or children, as security for a loan rather than for pay. Although the value of the work done always exceeds the value of the loan, high interest rates and corruption ensures that that debt is never paid off. The person therefore remains a bonded labourer.

The United Nations working group on contemporary forms of slavery estimates that in 1999 about 20 million people worldwide were held as bonded labourers. Those labourers usually work between 12 and 16 hours a day, seven days a week. They may be bound to work on the land, processing agricultural products, working in silk production or carpet weaving or engaged in quarrying.

Bonded labourers are not paid for their work, or are paid very little. They are often subjected to rape or beatings, and are sometimes locked or chained to their work. Many suffer malnutrition, and they all clearly suffer from a lack of health care and education. As the hon. Gentleman said, despite bonded labour being illegal in almost every country where it is practised, it continues to exist because of poverty and the lack of willingness of the police, the judiciary and the Government to enforce the law.

Many cases illustrate the appalling conditions in which bonded labourers work. One case, involving a non-governmental organisation called the Integrated Village Development Trust, concerned the bribing of 60 people by a carpet workshop owner in the district of Jharkhand in January 2004. At the time, all but the wealthier landowners were suffering drought and desperate hardship. Many owed the workshop owner money and were thus forced into working for him.

Among those taken into bondage by the owner were five boys under the age of 14, whose parents were agricultural labourers; the parents had taken out various loans from the workshop owner. The child labourers were forced to work for 12 or more hours a day. They were given no days off, not even for traditional festivals. They were fed twice a day on watery rice and dhal. No wages were paid. They were regularly beaten. Indeed, it is alleged that the owner was responsible for the deaths of two child workers.

That case, which is typical in south Asia, highlights the barbarity and inhumanity of the bonded labour system, and it especially highlights the illegality of bonding children. Not only was bonded labour abolished under Indian law in 1976, but employing children under the age of 14 on carpet looms is banned. The labourers in that case have been released, because some of the local villagers had links to people in local NGOs, who were able to apply pressure. I therefore strongly urge the Government and the Department for International Development to put pressure on south Asian Governments such as the Indian Government to enforce laws concerning the abolition of bonded labour. I wonder if that will be made more difficult as the scale of the UK Government's involvement in India is wound down, now that India and the UK have agreed that the UK should focus its attention, in international development terms, on countries in greater need, although in relation to bonded labour there is a clear need for involvement in India.

I also urge the Government to support more income-generating projects explicitly for bonded labourers, such as the support that they have given to ActionAid's poverty reduction project in the Kailali district of Nepal, which helps bonded labourers to achieve secure livelihoods. Funding also needs to be increased for projects that release labourers from bondage and rehabilitate them, and projects that encourage the development of civil society, because it is more likely that the law will be enforced in such societies.

As we have heard today, contemporary slavery is not only a problem for developing countries; migrants who are trafficked into the UK are often held in slave-like conditions. Members, the Minister and the spokesman for the official Opposition have expressed concern at the plight of trafficked workers. Will the Minister use today's debate to announce that the UK will ratify the UN migrant workers convention, which came into force in July 2003? Clearly, that would provide people who are working in the UK as slaves with the safeguards that they should have, but do not. I hope that if the Minister does not announce Government support for the convention, she will be able to explain why they do not support it. The convention aims to protect migrant workers' rights, such as the right to live and work in humane living conditions, regardless of their legal status in the UK—in other words, so that trafficked people would not simply be thrown out of the country, as my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) said earlier, and would have some rights that can be enforced here. I have today tabled an early-day motion calling on the Government to do that.

The hon. Member for Islington, North mentioned the issue of caste. A caste system can be defined as a hierarchy based on historically embedded cultural, social and economic differences between people. Caste systems are not simply about religion, although religion does play a part in supporting them. As we have heard, such systems are prevalent in south Asia, particularly in India, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh, and in some African countries, such as Nigeria and Somalia.

I shall focus principally on the Dalit people, and am pleased that we have here at the debate someone who clearly knows a lot more about that subject than I do. The Dalits are at the bottom of the caste system and have the least resources and power in society. It is estimated that 260 million people across the world are poor because of their place in the caste system. Dalits are the untouchables—a pool of cheap labour that is used by the rest of society. Typically, the jobs that they are allowed to do include road sweeping and toilet cleaning. Cultural norms ensure that Dalits are separated from others and isolated from other castes. They have to remove their shoes when walking through other parts of the village, and are exploited for being at the bottom of the caste system. In many respects, they are in an identical position to that of bonded labourers: they are bound to the same job for generations because of their inherited, rigid position in society. Their jobs are paid, albeit at a low rate, and one could argue that they are secure, but Dalits are the social group most likely to be sold into bonded labour when the family needs extra money for weddings, funerals or hospital bills. Money is borrowed from a family member's employer, or from a money lender, in exchange for labour. Although Dalits are likely to become bonded labourers, that does not automatically mean that all bonded labourers are Dalits, especially where caste systems do not prevail.

As we have heard, Dalits are supposed to be protected under Indian and international law. The Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes (Prevention Of Atrocities) Act 1989 in India is an instrument under which those holding Dalits in bonded labour can be prosecuted. A number of UN conventions also recognise that allocating labour by caste or descent is a form of discrimination.

Along with the implementation of the Indian law in 1989 and similar laws across south Asia, other measures have been taken to advance the position of Dalits in society, such as the provision of loans. In the Punjab, loans are provided through two schemes: the integrated rural development programme and the Punjab scheduled caste finance corporation. However, both schemes have been beset by problems. For example, having received a loan, people were no longer considered to be living below the poverty line, whether or not they had benefited from the loan. Corruption is endemic in the system, with middlemen and the authorities taking a cut of the loan for themselves or for higher caste families. In addition, Indian Government guidelines specify that the loans should be given to young, educated Dalits, but 80 per cent. of loans have gone to illiterate people, most of whom were more than 50 years old and had little training on how to make best use of the money. Not surprisingly, the schemes have failed and people are now in a worse position than before, because they cannot repay the additional debts that they have incurred.

The Department for International Development has a role and it is entirely appropriate that it should consider its policies in relation to Dalits. I have tabled a series of parliamentary questions today to establish whether, in its policies, it ensures that both it and the organisations that it supports are aware of caste discrimination and that they respond to the challenge.

Even in the UK there is discrimination against Dalits. I met some Dalits recently, one of whom is a senior person working at a hospital in Ealing. He said that not he but a woman Dalit colleague of his had encountered enormous problems in establishing her authority as a manager, because the people of a higher caste with whom she worked did not recognise that she could possibly manage them. He said that there was even graffiti in the hospital—simply the word "caste"—to remind her that she had no authority in the caste system.

The problem is an issue here, so it is entirely appropriate that the Department should consider how to respond to it. Perhaps we could ensure that, for instance, UK companies that export call centre jobs to India, which can be positive for international development, use the quota system that the Indian Government say should apply to Dalits. I hope that the Minister will respond to that—if not now, then in writing—and confirm that the Department of Trade and Industry talks to British businesses that export jobs to India and other south Asian countries about responding on the caste issue and ensuring that Dalits are properly represented.

I could have carried on at length about child soldiers, which is another significant problem. Forcibly enrolling children into armies, such as the Lord's Resistance Army in northern Uganda, amounts to a form of bonded or slave labour. On that point, I hope that the UK Government can enter into a discussion with the Ugandan Government to ensure that the latter's response to the crisis is not simply military. A military response will inevitably end up killing many of the child slave labourers who were forced to join the Lord's Resistance Army. I hope that the Minister can respond positively on that point.

Also—and perhaps this issue comes under the Minister's brief—have the Government considered changing the asylum rules that apply to child soldiers? I understand that child soldiers are not eligible for asylum. However, a strong case can be made for making some children who have been forcibly enrolled into the Lord's Resistance Army eligible for asylum. Perhaps I have misunderstood the situation, and I hope that the Minister can say what the thinking is on the issue.

To conclude, there is still much work to be done on all forms of slavery, and especially on bonded labour, the exploitation of the Dalits by the caste system, child labour—and child soldiers in particular—and the enslavement of migrants in the UK. As we know, this year is the UN's international year to commemorate the struggle against slavery and its abolition. Next year, the UK will hold the presidency of both the EU and the G8. We cannot miss the golden opportunity to use those presidencies to tackle the poverty and misery caused by contemporary forms of slavery, and to try to make amends for the UK's previous role in the slave trade.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Minister for leading this debate during black history month and UNESCO's international year to commemorate the struggle against slavery and its abolition.

I was pleased to sponsor early-day motion 1010, which now has 147 signatures, at the request of the black community in Liverpool. It calls for national education recognising slavery as a crime against humanity and for the setting-up of a national slavery remembrance day, a proposal that is now gathering much support.

It is appropriate that the call comes from Liverpool, which, along with London and Bristol, was the major port of the transatlantic slave trade. By 1795, Liverpool controlled 80 per cent. of Britain's slave trade, and 40 per cent. of the European slave trade. More than 5,000 slaving voyages started from Liverpool. Liverpool's ships transported half the 3 million Africans transported across the Atlantic.

I hope that we can see a great contrast with my predecessors—those, I hasten to add, of the 18th and 19th centuries—who, together with 25 lord mayors of that period, were closely involved with slavery. There have been great changes in the local press. A sugar plantation owner, John Gladstone, the father of William Ewart Gladstone, wrote a pro-slavery column in the Liverpool Mercury under the pen name of Mercurator. Whatever comments we might have in our local press today, no such column would be tolerated in the Liverpool Echo or the Daily Post.

In 1788, Liverpool's citizens presented a petition against the abolition of slavery to Parliament. It stated that the petitioners contemplated "with real concern" proposals for abolition, and it pointed out that slavery continued > "to form a very extensive branch of the commerce of Liverpool and of the Kingdom".

Liverpool has also played a pivotal role in bringing this shameful history to the public's attention. Liverpool Museums and Galleries set up its permanent transatlantic slave gallery in 1994. In 1999, it inaugurated Liverpool's slavery remembrance day, working with the black community, the city council and others. I was pleased to be present when the late Bernie Grant, the Member for Tottenham, unveiled a plaque on the dock from which slave ships once sailed. That was an important day, and everybody present was moved by the significance of the event. I pay tribute to the late Richard Foster for his foresight and to David Fleming and his staff at the museum for the progressive way in which they have developed his legacy.

The city of Liverpool itself has already formally apologised for slavery and its impact.

The key proposal in the early-day motion that I sponsored is that we should have a national slavery remembrance day, and it is worth taking time to consider the reasons why that is important. The first is that we need to focus on key issues in a way that ensures that there is a permanency about commemoration, so that it does not last only for one day or a number of days, but takes place year after year.

We also need to educate all our citizens about the fact that although transatlantic slavery made fortunes for individuals, helped to develop capitalist society and laid the basis for the wealth of banks such as Martins, Barclays and the Midland, it degraded and dehumanised millions of African people. Africans were cruelly and forcibly removed from their families and communities, stripped naked and held in leg irons below deck in cramped ships that took them to the Americas, where they were sold into slavery to create wealth for others. At times, more than 30 per cent. would die en route, and their bodies would be cast into the water. The only reason why that appalling figure was reduced was that the slave owners were concerned about making less money from their cargo of human beings.

A national remembrance day is also needed to celebrate slaves' rebellions and the resistance that played such an important part in their emancipation. Indeed, it has been suggested that 23 August would be appropriate for a remembrance day because it was the date in 1791 on which the successful rising in Santo Domingo—now Haiti—took place. Although it is important that we talk about philanthropy and reform movements in this country and elsewhere, we should never forget that the slaves themselves led rebellions and revolutions and were a vital part of their emancipation.

It is also important to have a permanent national remembrance day so that we recognise that the unequal relationship caused by transatlantic slavery led to racism, much of which still persists. Liverpool's maritime connections brought people from all over the world for many generations, and the city's black community goes back to the 1700s, yet too many black Liverpudlians still do not feel fully accepted. Local people such as Ray and Edith Costello trace their ancestry to the 19th century, but in his history of black people in Liverpool, Ray Costello talks about the feeling among so many black people that they are still not fully part of the community.

Recently, I was pleased to launch the Ministry of Defence exhibition "We Were There" in St. George's hall, in Liverpool. The exhibition shows the contribution made by black and minority people to two centuries of United Kingdom defence. There were 3 million volunteers during the second world war alone, but why is it only now that the black and minority ethnic contribution to the United Kingdom's defence is slowly being recognised? It is rare that we see the contribution of black people as part of all our history. I am glad that the exhibition has been set up, that it is in Liverpool and that it is going round the country, but we must all ask, "Why only now?" It is important to have a national remembrance day so that we can celebrate diversity and immigration on the basis of equality.

Several hon. Members have spoken about the disgrace of present-day slavery, which takes several different forms, and part of the reason for a national remembrance day must be to campaign against current injustices and manifestations of slavery. Those include the 20 million people who are suffering bonded labour, the people who are forced to work almost as slaves on Brazilian estates, and the abominable trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation—the scandal of our time.

Home Office figures show that, in 1998, 1,420 women were trafficked into the United Kingdom for sexual exploitation. That figure may well be an underestimate because the nature of the problem means that it is very difficult to be precise, but it is just one indication of the abomination that is going on before our eyes and that requires national, European and international effort and determination for it to be eradicated.

What form should slavery remembrance day take? It could include many things: mandatory education in schools about slavery, as part of the national curriculum; ceremonies and events to mark the past and to guide the future; support for events such as Rendezvous of Victory's annual people's university of lifelong learning; and a cross-community consultative forum.

Tom Brake: Does the hon. Lady agree that it is important that the curriculum should present a picture that includes value judgments? I understand that the UK curriculum gives a very neutral presentation of Dalits and the caste system, which our education system should address.

Mrs. Ellman: I support the hon. Gentleman's comments. We could do that with support and contributions from people who might know more about their own history than those whom they are trying to educate. We have models on which this could be based—we have, for example, a holocaust memorial day, and educational materials produced by people with specific knowledge. This is certainly not value-free. We have the experience to know how to proceed with the hon. Gentleman's suggestions.

Remembrance day could also take the form of the development of a global citizenship education curriculum with pan-African educators, and programmes of action from the 2001 world conference against racism. This is not a definitive list; these are simply some suggestions.

At the moment, the national museums in Liverpool are working with the Liverpool Capital of Culture Company, of which I am a member, the black community, Granby residents' association, the city council and others to build a new museum centre to promote knowledge of transatlantic slavery. It is proposed that the centre will include a research centre, an academic centre and workshops. It will also be interactive. The centre is being developed in such a way that the visitor will not simply be a bystander who looks at something that has happened and moves on, but will be asked to consider slavery in relation to concepts of freedom and justice, human rights, current under-development in Africa and the Caribbean, reparations and contemporary slavery.

It is hoped that the museum and centre will be ready for 2007—the year before Liverpool becomes the European capital of culture in 2008. The year 2007 is significant both for Liverpool and for the fact that it is 200 years since the end of slavery in the UK. Liverpool has been central to slavery, to exposing the shamefulness of slavery, to trying to make citizens of the city and the world understand what has happened, and to trying to do better in future. It is a multicultural city—the world in one city.

It would be a fitting tribute if the opening of the new museum and centre came at the same time as the Government's recognition of national slavery remembrance day to remember and expose the past and to fight for a better future.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), who offered us thoughts about how we can properly commemorate the past and look to the future. The Minister was very fair in her introduction, offering hon. Members the opportunity to make such suggestions, and it is good that the Opposition readily accepted that offer.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, as the quality of the contributions has been remarkable. The common thread running through the debate has been the wish to highlight not only an evil aspect of our past, but what is happening now and the sadness that besets the world in which we live because slavery is far from dead. It is alive and well, and billions of dollars are made every year from the wretched way in which human beings are prepared to treat each other.

I accept everything that has been said about historical significance and the debt we owe to those people, black and white, who fought so hard against slavery. Some gave their lives to that fight. Wilberforce sacrificed his health in the campaign; some would say that much of his life was not well spent, but I doubt that anyone in this Chamber shares that that view. All of us are indebted to him for his commitment. Any commemoration would be right to recognise the people, black and white, who sacrificed their lives in various ways to bring about a change to the system—albeit not an end to slavery.

As a Member of this Parliament's delegation to the Council of Europe, I have long been actively involved in work to combat the exploitation of people. I have been responsible for writing reports on institutionalised children who are subsequently exploited and on the trafficking of human beings for organ transplantation. Once one starts to engage with the issue, it does not take long to understand, first, its complex nature; secondly the huge amount of money involved and, thirdly, the wretched existence that many people endure.

I spoke to a young girl who was first traded in Moldova for $100; she went through five countries to end up in the fifth traded in a sex shop in Antwerp, valued at $2,000. In two years in Europe, she had been exploited in five countries, all EU members. Fifty thousand under-age girls from Moldova alone currently work the streets in the sex trade in Italy. We can calculate that if they work five nights a week and have five clients a night, 1,250,000 illegal sexual acts are taking place per week in that single EU country—yet there were fewer than 100 prosecutions in the whole of Italy in a year. That does not make sense.

In this country, 1,400 women in a similar position are known to the Home Office—and they are only the ones that are known about. The true figure might be treble that number, if not many thousands more. Recently in Portsmouth two houses were closed down that were occupied by people in the sex trade—seven young ladies from China. What did we do? The response of the Home Office was the speedy repatriation of those girls to China and a very light sentence for the people behind the trade.

It is completely nonsensical to send girls back—to what? One has only to talk to people who have been exploited to know that, and, sadly, I have spoken to women who have been through that experience. Some of them have been traded, then sent back to their home countries from France, Belgium or the UK, but have been put back in the trade within months of their return. Why? Because the punishment for resisting is so bad for their families, and they would probably end up dead because those behind the trade would be so conscious of the evidence that they could offer.

The UK Government should be doing more. We should properly commemorate the passage of 200 years since the abolition of slavery. I want us to apologise for the part of our history of which no reasonable person could fail to be ashamed. I want us to introduce a proper commemoration—not only a one-day event, but a lasting memorial. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside gave a good example in relation to the holocaust memorial. We should do something similar.

More important, I want the British Government to play a proactive part in co-operating and working purposefully to establish a European convention to which we shall willingly sign up, and work with our European Union and Council of Europe partners to ensure that it is in place. We want a common policy on fighting the trade. Trafficking is not remedied by simply sending people back. We must understand the consequences of that action for those human beings when they are returned to the evil people who sent them on their awful journey in the first place. If we fail in that, this debate will not be worth the paper on which it is printed in Hansard. It will be meaningless because it will have only addressed historical aspects and done nothing to advance the case of so many people who touch our lives in many ways, from the shoes and clothes that we wear to the scenes of exploitation that we see regularly on television.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) referred to a trip along Oxford street to look at labels and explore what lies behind them. How many of us are not guilty of being part of the trade? We buy from those who are part of the system. He spoke with great eloquence about the get-out clause, whereby people say that they buy from subcontractors and did not know the source of the items. Really? I doubt that. We have only to look at the price that the traders paid for the items to realise that they knew the source. We have only to talk to buyers. I have sat on many aeroplanes next to people from the United Kingdom who were on buying expeditions to the far east and India. I represent a large Bengali population, and my constituents have told me many times that they have met business people from the UK in Bengal trying to undercut even already badly undercut prices, as a result of which further exploitation goes on.

As Members of Parliament, we have a responsibility to do more than just pay lip service to the debate today. The Government's duty is more than merely to give aid and say that we will target certain areas.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does not the hon. Gentleman think that when negotiating trade agreements, the World Trade Organisation should be far tougher on exploitation and all that goes with it? For example, incredibly low-paid workers producing cheap goods has a depressing effect on everyone else's living standards, because of the competition rules.

Mr. Hancock: I agree entirely. I have long believed that the World Trade Organisation has lost the plot in that respect. It does not want to discuss the issue, which is an embarrassment to the organisation, as it is to the society that it is trying to prop up by allowing such action to continue and not dealing with the problem.

When we target aid, we must be careful. Sadly, I have been in countries where aid projects that were put there for all the right reasons have been hijacked. When the eye is not watching what is happening all the time, people are simply further exploited. The benefits that we bring to small towns and villages and the way in which we make things happen or change the way in which local society is organised can make exploitation easier. The EU in particular has several questions to answer about why it does not follow through properly and fails to monitor and control the way in which its aid is used. In some instances, aid has made a situation worse, not better, because it has been given but not properly accounted for.

I am delighted that we having the debate and I hope that the Minister will give commitments that the Government can deliver. The evil of slavery is still with us. It is alive and well in our country, across Europe and throughout the world. If we do not make our Government more accountable to the House on such issues, they will have more excuse for not insisting that international organisations such as the United Nations, the EU and the Council of Europe do not give excuses for doing nothing. I have sat through too many debates on the issue and met too many dispirited, disheartened children whose lives have been ruined by such exploitation. We have to do something more than erect a statue, celebrate a day and print nice words in Hansard. We must have a commitment from our nation to say that we have had 200 years to get it right, but have not yet done so. Let us move forward, not just look backwards.

4.25 pm

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): As we have heard, 2004 is the UN international year to commemorate the struggle against slavery and its abolition. As one of many British citizens descended from slaves, I am gratified that this Government are the first in modern British history—I believe—to initiate a debate on slavery. We are here to consider the history of slavery, but also how to prevent its existence in future.

UNESCO says:

> "The slave trade is probably the human tragedy that affected the greatest number of people for the longest period of time in history."

Today it persists in new forms of massive violations of human rights proclaimed in the universal declaration of human rights in the United Nations in 1948, including child labour, forced labour, prostitution, and so forth.

Current estimates suggest that today 27 million people work as slaves. I will return to present-day slavery, but I wanted to highlight the experience of some of the Africans themselves, or their descendents, in the so-called middle passage. Those slaves who were able to free themselves—people such as Fredrick Douglass, Olaudah Equiano, Ottobah Cuguano and Phillis Wheatley—were all astonishing leaders who emerged from a background of degradation and human cruelty that we can barely imagine. It is important in a debate in 2004 in Westminster to hear some of their voices come back. I am always astonished when I read their descriptions. Cuguano wrote of his experience when he was placed into the slave ship that > "when we found ourselves at last taken away, death was more preferable than life, and a plan was concerted amongst us, that we might burn and blow up the ship, and . . . perish all together in the flames; but we were betrayed by one of our own . . . it would be needless to give a description of all the horrible scenes which we saw . . . Brought from a state of innocence and freedom, and, in a barbarous and cruel manner, conveyed to a state of horror and slavery: this abandoned situation may be easier conceived than described."

Although it is difficult to describe these things, if only people were to read some of Frederick Douglass's work, and that of other amazing black figures who have done so much to illuminate and bring to life the horror, which, as Cuguano says, we can barely conceive.

As only the second black woman ever elected to the British Parliament, I feel that I should quote briefly from the first poem by Phillis Wheatley, America's first black poet, which, funnily enough, was about the English king and made her a sensation in 1767. She said:

> "How well the Cry for Liberty, and the reverse Disposition for the exercise of oppressive Power over others agree—I humbly think it does not require the Penetration of a Philosopher to determine."

If I may put that into 2004 slang, she is saying, "Isn't the hypocrisy of those individuals or government systems unbelievable, when they talk about liberty and freedom on one hand and practise oppression on the other?" It is instructive to consider the 12 million Africans who suffered as a result of that system and the 17 million Africans sold into slavery on the coast of the Indian ocean, the middle east and north Africa.

One thing that many African-American commentators stress is the pernicious nature of the institutions that followed slavery. As a bizarre aside, I would like to apologise to my father, who is a writer on the subject but whose books I had never read in my life, not even when they were among the politics course books at university. However, in preparation for this debate I thought that I would look up something that he had written on slavery in one of his books—he has been writing on slavery for ages and ages. He wrote about Frederick Douglass:

> "Douglass was clear that the need for resistance did not disappear with the institution of slavery. The life chances of the Afro-American were signally diminished not only by the peculiar institution, but also by the prejudicial arrangements that followed it. Emancipation was the end of an old game, but was also the old game being played in a new and more complex way."

I have to agree with my father's thoughts on that, not least if one considers the American penal system today. For instance, one astonishing statistic—every time I say it I think, "This can't be true", but it is what I was told—is that the number of African-American men, between the ages of 18 and 28 in jail today is greater than the number enslaved in the south. That is an indication of the complex ways in which institutional prejudice can cascade down the ages.

One thing that this debate is concerned with is the legacy of the slave trade. In that context, I should like to mention the situation in the great lakes region in Africa. I chair the all-party group on the great lakes region and genocide prevention, and I returned from Africa a few days ago. I am always amazed by the legacy that one can see clearly, although it is not a legacy of just slavery—obviously it is wrapped up with colonialism and there are also problems that Africans have brought on themselves, which one cannot for a moment walk away from.

There are many problems there, but if we consider Phyllis Wheatley's point about hypocrisy, surely the person who wins the title for the biggest hypocrite in the whole debate on slavery over the past 200 years is King Leopold of the Belgians. If we are talking about books that people should read if they are interested in the subject, I can say that "King Leopold's Ghost" by Adam Hochschild is an astonishing piece of work that shows how rubber slavery, as it was called then, killed 10 million people and left a legacy that is all around. Hochschild writes:

> "People in Europe continued to feel indignant over the 'Arab' slave-traders based on Zanzibar and Africa's east coast . . . European righteousness over the issue was more intertwined than ever with a growing desire for African colonies. Conveniently, the slave-traders were mostly Muslim, which allowed Europeans to feel still more virtuous . . . Leopold . . . impressed people with his vigorous denunciations of the slave trade that he was elected honorary president of a venerable British human rights organisation."

Even more shockingly, the king used his position to set up slave-trading routes. The man was clever—really clever:

> "The king described the need for fortified posts, roads, railways and steamboats, all of which would support columns of troops pursuing the slavers. He grandly offered the services of the new Congo state towards this noble end and asked in return only that the conference authorise him to levy import duties to finance the attack on slavery."

That passage takes my breath away—it is a description of the anti-slavery conference that King Leopold used as a bridge to move into the Congo and a fig leaf to cover his genocidal ambitions, and he got away with it. It is also worth mentioning a white bureaucrat, Edmund Morel, who was truly outstanding in showing what King Leopold was doing and ensuring that he was eventually no longer able to get away with it.

I have already quoted from another publication from closer to home, one that is published by the Tower Hamlets African Caribbean Mental Health Organisation. Perhaps communities outside the black community might think that it is really strange—why would a mental health organisation today be publishing something about black slaves or about freed slaves? There are two reasons. The first is to redress the imbalance of knowledge. People do not know what those black people did and the contribution that they made. The second is to try to inspire black people today. Jesse Jackson's words always spring to mind. He said to the black community:

> "You are not responsible for being down, but you are responsible for getting up."

I have given a fantastic example of how the east London Afro-Caribbean community has taken that on board.

I want to mention Anti-Slavery International, an NGO to which many people have referred. I have worked with it and have read its reports for seven years. I am always incredibly impressed by what it does.

I will conclude on the subject of present-day slavery, which we know means bonded labour. There are currently 20 million bonded labourers. It also means early and forced marriage, and we need to think about that. What does it mean to a 13-year-old girl who is essentially sold by her family into a marriage and is a sexual slave—quite often of a man who is 30 or 40 years older? That is also modern-day slavery. There is also forced labour, slavery by descent, trafficking and the worst forms of child labour to consider. An estimated 179 million children are forced to work in a way that is harmful to their health and welfare. There are also children who are forced into war.

I am always drawn to the human stories behind the statistics. I wanted to highlight a case that is on Anti-Slavery International's website. It is about Adriana, who was 16 when her father forced her to get engaged to a man from her home country of Albania. After staying with that man, Driton, and his family, the couple travelled to Greece. Adriana was then told by Driton that she would have to work as a prostitute. She completely rejected that idea, but he said that it would just be until they had enough money to buy a house and that he would beat her to death if she did not do it. She did and they flew to Paris using fake documents.

Whey they arrived, Driton forced Adriana to work on the streets as a prostitute. If she made any less than $300 a day, he beat her badly. Adriana called her parents. She was too ashamed to tell them the truth, so she told them that she could not send them any money back because she had not yet found a job. Her father told her not to bother lying to him, because he knew what she was doing. He was the one that had sold her to Driton for $20,000. She was eventually arrested by the police and deported back to Albania.

That is modern-day slavery. It happens all around and we must ensure that we give greater strength to the 1990 UN convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families. We must also ensure that we have greater understanding that with increasing numbers of people moving away from their homes and families and being forced to migrate, increasing numbers will face the sort of situation that Adriana did.

Obviously, I am pleased that the UK Government were one of the first to sign the optional protocol to the United Nations convention on transnational organised crime, which deals with the trafficking of human beings. The Government are fully committed to its implementation. Worldwide, between 600,000 and 900,000 people are trafficked every year. The criminals running the trade earn more than $10 billion a year, and up to a third of their victims are children.

Of course I want to see the Government do more, and I am sure that when the Minister responds she will outline some of the further measures that the Government are taking. One of the most important is about the underlying issues of poverty. The UK is taking action to free Africa from the slavery of poverty; that can be seen from this year's UK aid budget, 41 per cent. of which goes to Africa.

Yes, I want a proper apology for the slave trade. Yes, I want a proper commemoration that highlights the horrors that my ancestors and others faced. However, I want more than that. More than both those things, I want a concerted effort by the international community to prevent the evils of slavery continuing down the ages, whether that involves eastern European women being trafficked, African women or the horrific situation facing the Dalits and others in some of the Asian caste systems. The fact is that slavery continues—27 million people are slaves today. Let us prioritise them above all else.

4.42 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): It is difficult to speak last before the Minister because so much has been said. The debate has been very moving, and influential in making one's own views of this dreadful subject clearer. The starting point is that, much as we will look historically at slavery, slavery is as much a problem today as it was in the days of Wilberforce. Anyone who thinks that we can pass it off as something historical is sadly deluded.

However, I will start with a bit of history. It is good that my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) is here. Like me, he will know from his time in Stroud that we commemorate the passing of anti-slavery legislation. There is an anti-slavery arch in Stroud, and Archway school is named after it. Recently, I had the honour of going to its refurbishment reopening—if there is such a thing—to commemorate the fact that in the days when slavery legislation eventually came to pass, the good burghers of Stroud paid money through public subscription to put up an arch. In those days, it was probably in the middle of nowhere, but now there is a housing estate around it.

People there are still proud of their arch, to the extent that money was raised again to put it back together when it was beginning to deteriorate because of the wear and tear of our climate over the years. The Stroud preservation trust in particular was responsible for making sure that the arch was brought back to a reasonable state of order. Various speakers came to the opening to talk about anti-racism and anti-slavery today. I make the connection between the past and the present and to say that my constituency has a tradition of which it is proud, and which continues today.

[Mr. David Drew]

Archway school has always prided itself on its internationalism and willingness to debate issues. I remember going to its debating society; my hon. Friend the hon. Member for High Peak may have been there too. The society was called the Soper—it was named after Lord Donald Soper, who is sadly no longer with us. As a result, it has always looked to do things on an international footing.

Bob Willey, a teacher there who has recently retired, has for a number of years taken groups of students to Geneva as part of the human rights and anti-slavery movements. Those students have engaged with students from all manner of other countries, to talk about what we in Britain could do to draw more attention to the problems that slavery continues to represent in our world. Again, I make no apology for paying tribute to Bob; I hope that he and the students from Archway school will continue with that work.

In passing, I am reminded of last year's national prayer breakfast. I will be chairman of this year's prayer breakfast, which is in a week's time; but last year, under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), Andy Harrison was invited to perform his monologue on William Wilberforce. There is no more powerful way of representing what Wilberforce stood for in only eight minutes. The monologue told us what life was like for Wilberforce when trying to persuade this place of his ideas—it has not always been the most radical of places. It told us how that man set himself up with that one challenge, and was able to show how the votes had gradually moved in the right direction. It showed us that, time after time, year after year, Wilberforce was rejected and personally humiliated. It showed us also that he went through all manner of health problems on the back of getting his ideas accepted—it was his destiny as a Christian to try to get through those trials.

That is history. The question is where are we today. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King), I went last year to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where slavery is an ever-present problem. Even dearer to me—it is my passion—is Sudan. It is associated with many of the ills of our world, not least of which is Darfur, a place that I visited a few months back. The all-party group on Sudan will release its report in a couple of weeks—at least I hope so; it is now being written up.

The problems of the Sudan are legion. We could go completely off the subject—I shall try not to do so—and delve into that country's recent past. What shocked me more than anything was the question of slavery in Sudan. It has been recurrent, in the sense that it has been indicative of the African-Asian conflict between Muslims and the Christian south. There are some hopeful signs, but the slavery element hits home because of the way in which we have tried to deal with it.

Although she is not of my political persuasion, I have tremendous respect for Baroness Cox. She got involved in slave redemption—she did it for good Christian reasons—but we all know what happened, with abuses and with slaves being bought and then bought back, and with people making money on the back of it.

One of the problems with slavery is that we can talk about it—the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) gave us a great peroration—but if it is all words, it makes no difference. The problem with slavery is ending it. It is good that Governments can pass resolutions in the United Nations; it is even better for us to do things on a more finite level at Westminster. When it comes down to it, however, it is difficult to persuade people that slavery is wrong when they earn their livelihood from it. They think that what they are doing is not wrong, because of the cultural and the attitudinal things that have for generations constituted the way in which people live their lives.

It is problematic. As with slave redemption, we can see how not to do it; everyone now agrees that what was going on was probably fallible even if genuine. The question is what one should do instead when people say, "If you are not going to pay us for these people, we'll just get rid of them", because that is the reality: they are simply a meal ticket to these people. It is therefore incredibly difficult to deal with the problem. We see that with trafficking and the way in which the west engages with it, because we do, in a sense, exploit these people by allowing them to come through in the worst possible way.

Trafficking does huge psychological damage, whether through conflict or by treating people purely as vessels. It really does do enormous damage to them, but it also eventually damages everyone connected to it, because it is unsustainable. We can all see what has gone wrong. I was a bit of an economic historian in previous incarnations, and I am aware that it is very easy to justify these things. Some econometricians, for example, have tried to defend slavery on economic rather than moral grounds, and have argued that it was fundamental, along with the railways, to the creation of modern America. America did exploit slavery to build its economic wealth, so I am not sure whether we can blame George Bush for that, although we can blame him for many other things. There is an antecedent to the way in which modern countries, including our own, have used slavery for economic growth, and it is very dangerous to see that continuing today.

We must deal with the international aspects of slavery. It is still there, and still needs more than just motions and resolutions. It needs activity. We must always ask, through our Government, how something will fund economic activity, and if it has anything to do with slavery, we should pull back from it, no matter how much difficulty that causes us, and say, "This is unacceptable." "A fair wage for a fair day's work" must be our motto, and if that is the only way we can deal with slavery, that is how we should proceed.

Fiona Mactaggart: With the leave of the House, I shall sum up the debate. I know that that is not usual, but it seems proper in view of the tone of the debate. I also want to take the opportunity to answer some of the questions that hon. Members have asked.

I believe that those who have spoken in this debate share a sense of horror about the history of slavery, a sense of shame that Britain's history and prosperity were built on such a tragic trade, and a sense of determination to ensure that the abuse of human rights inherent in the slave trade is not repeated. I believe that we also have a shared determination to make appropriate reparations for slavery, both historically and as it exists now. I was pleased by the range of suggestions—the statue proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) and the proposals advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), for which that she has been campaigning for some time—and to hear about the memorial day and activities that are already happening in Stroud.

I was keen to cast forward to the bicentenary of the abolition of the trade, because we should remember that slavery in Britain was still legal for many years thereafter. Talking about the bicentenary was an opportunity to broaden the debate, instead of confining our discussion to the usual suspects and the active campaigns about an appropriate way to acknowledge and make practical reparations for this history.

I am pleased by the acknowledgement of how racism in the present day has its origins in slavery, and I am glad that I have helped to force my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) to read her father's writing. She should do more of that. His analysis of how formal slavery was swapped for a new form of slavery is endorsed by many people's experience.

I believe that we have provided a springboard: I suspect that it is unprecedented for a Government to initiate a debate of this kind—at least, I have not been able to find a precedent. It is always a bit nerve-wracking in this place to claim that there is none, because then somebody will be sure to discover one. I thank hon. Members for being gracious enough to acknowledge that I am not in a position to answer for all the Departments that have an interest in this matter. I will try to ensure that all their questions are answered; I will address some of them now, but if my response is inadequate, I am sure that they will encourage me to follow things up with my colleagues. I will ensure that the debate is copied to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development, because I think that he in particular will welcome it.

I am glad that at many points in the debate we connected the history of racism and slavery with our present determination to tackle poverty and its consequences. I reiterate our commitment to using our presidency of the G8 to play an active role in the review of the implementation of the millennium development goals, which the international community signed up to achieve by 2015. Let us remember those pledges—that every child will attend primary school, to combat HIV/AIDS and to reduce extreme poverty. It is essential that the G8 and other donors live up to the commitments to increase aid and make it more effective in tackling poverty and to improve the way in which our policies cohere with our development goals.

I was asked whether I was confident that our international development strategies include enough to deal with forms of contemporary slavery, as well as tackle extreme poverty. I sensed an anxiety in some Members about the focus on extreme poverty. The economic development of countries such as India is moving forward swiftly. Will a consequence of that be that some of the issues that have been raised are given insufficient attention or ignored?

Tom Brake: Is the Minister aware that India has turned down an offer from the Danes to investigate the issue of Dalits? She is right to be concerned that the focus may go off such matters.

Fiona Mactaggart: The evidence is that the focus in the UK's programme has not gone off those matters. That is important. We continue to work on them with the International Labour Organisation, the United Nations, non-governmental organisations and other Governments. I gave some examples of that work.

We have signed up to some key international instruments. I intend to discuss some of the international conventions that concerns have been expressed about.

Jeremy Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend not concerned that the ILO's inspection rights and powers of enforcement of existing statutes are limited, and, beyond that, that they are wholly inadequate for dealing with the issue of either zero wages or very low wages in the poorest countries?

Fiona Mactaggart: There are issues about how the ILO can be effective. Part of our role as an aid giver is to work in a way that supports the ILO in taking international action and supports some of those grass-roots or ground-level initiatives that I cited, which can protect forced labourers or help them to escape. They can also help to promote legislation to prevent certain practices—I gave the example of camel drivers in the United Arab Emirates.

As the debate makes clear, there is no single bullet that will put an end to this kind of abuse. What we need is a combination of international will, international legal frameworks, bilateral pressure on Governments that fail to meet the standards that the international community expects, and investment in the citizens of poor countries to enable them to make the necessary changes. My hon. Friend is right to say that some measures could be stronger, and that they would be more effective if they were, but he acknowledges that the UK has played a substantial role in pressing for the strengthening of international institutions. We have also played a leading role in providing practical support to on-the-ground citizens' initiatives, which can make a difference.

A sustainable international development strategy is a key requirement if we are to begin to tackle such issues. It is not inevitable that countries that become more prosperous have better records on human rights and other issues, but development tends to happen that way. One reason for that is that the pressures on such countries to meet standards get broader, because other countries are not only aid givers, but potential investors who do not want to risk their reputations by being involved in child labour, for example. A multi-strand strategy that combines international conventions, our aid programme and growing investment and development in poorer countries can therefore help.

I was asked specific questions about child soldiers, including whether they could be treated as refugees. Our position—this is very important internationally—is that the 1951 refugee convention is the cornerstone of refugee status in the UK, although its position as such is often threatened. The convention provides for anyone who has a well-founded fear of persecution on the grounds of race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership of a social group. The courts have interpreted that provision quite widely in some cases. If someone can demonstrate a well-founded fear of persecution on one of those grounds, they can qualify for refugee status.

On whether the Government will establish a slavery memorial day, the Prime Minister said in 2000 that we should consider it. He recognised

> "the support expressed . . . for commemorating the suffering of all those sent into slavery, and celebrating its abolition. A Slavery Memorial Day is one possibility. But there might be alternatives."

I hope that our discussion will put some welly behind the debate about the proper way to commemorate such things—indeed, I think that it already has. [Interruption.] I am seeing some twitching: perhaps "welly" is not a very parliamentary term. None the less, I hope that our discussion will make the wider debate more forceful and help it to grow. As I said at the beginning, that debate is taking place in quite a narrow field, although the early-day motion introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside has helped to broaden it, and I hope that this debate will do the same.

We want a commemoration that does justice to the issue. It might take the form of a day, or of doing something enormous for the bicentenary. It might involve developing national curriculum materials that mean that teachers can feel confident in teaching about slavery in a way that includes morality. I am not convinced that the history of slavery should be only in the history curriculum; it should be in the citizenship curriculum to mark the fact that people can be turned into commodities and how degrading that is. As the debate has shown, the fact that slavery still happens should touch the humanity of us all. There are a number of ways in which we must pursue the matter. I make a commitment to ensuring that by 2007, we will have a clear view of how the memorial should best be made. I will take on board the views of hon. Members expressed in the debate.

Questions have been raised about our commitment to a common European Union policy and about international conventions. We support the Council of Europe convention and are playing a full part in the negotiations and drafting of the report. We were one of the first signatories of the UN protocol on trafficking and we engaged fully in discussions on the subsequent EU framework decision. However, we have not signed up to some conventions and protocols, including the international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and members of their families and the European convention on the legal status of migrant workers. Those conventions, which seek to provide a universal way of dealing with some of the issues, do not necessarily provide a solution that will work best either for the extreme victims of trafficking, or for effective immigration control in Britain. For example, if anyone who had been a victim of trafficking had a statutory right of residence, we could put more people at risk of being trafficked. Our view is that providing effective refuge and support for victims and using the existing flexibility in the immigration rules on a case-by-case basis to provide status for people who have been trafficked is a better course of action.

Ms Oona King: I understand why to offer that right to people who had been trafficked might backfire, but are the Government willing to consider offering trafficked people such as Adriana, who I mentioned, a three-month period of reflection before they are deported back to their country of origin? Will my hon. Friend write and let me know whether they will consider that?

Fiona Mactaggart: In practice, that may well happen in many cases, but we are not planning to have a formal period of reflection because of the risk that I have already described. We are providing for trafficked people to have refuge and to be supported when, for example, they are giving evidence. It is important that when people are willing to give evidence against traffickers, we give them support, refuge and residence—the ability to stay in this country while that is happening. However, we are certain that to provide a blanket period carries risks that could make things worse.

We are reviewing the pilot Poppy project to try to see what works best to protect trafficked women. I hope that the House accepts our determination to protect the victims and to combine that protection with effective prevention of more women becoming victims. We will not sign up to a formula that might put some of that work at risk. We have also launched a consultation on all forms of sex crime, and that is one of the things that will be considered in the review. We have determined that we will review the work done so far before working out precisely what to do next.

Mr. Streeter: It might help the Minister to know that I strongly support the approach that she is taking. She mentioned the Poppy project, which supports 25 women and which the Government are reviewing. Is there any possibility of increasing the number of people that it helps? Given the scale of the problem, 25 is a very small number. I realise that it is a pilot, but we would strongly support the extension of that scheme to provide support for more people.

Fiona Mactaggart: We want to use the Poppy experience to ensure that we can protect women more effectively. One of the reasons why there are insufficient places is that there have been difficulties in moving on some of the women who have been one of the 25. One of the problems that we are addressing is what happens if the women get stuck there—for instance, if they have to stay in this country to give evidence. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will develop a proposal to tackle such bottlenecks. We recognise that the situation is unsatisfactory.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow expressed her horror at the fact that there are now more African-American people who are descended from slaves in United States jails than were in the country as slaves. Institutionalised racism is still present in the United Kingdom as well. There are more such people of the appropriate age in our jails than there are in our universities. I know that slavery helped to create the attitude to other human beings that underpins the workings of racism—we heard today about caste-ist graffiti about Dalits and other examples of hatred.

I am certain that, as well as commemorating the past and recognising that slavery is a crime against humanity that we cannot permit—we will take every step to prevent its continuation—we should be determined to deal with its legacy, the existence of racism and inequality in Britain. I hope that this debate proves to be the start of something, not the end. I have a feeling that it will. If any hon. Member has raised a matter that I have not been able to deal with, I shall be pleased to have it drawn to my attention after the debate. I shall make sure that I provide a response. I am glad that I took the risk of introducing the subject. We have proved that this is the right place to start. Now I want to ensure that this debate is the beginning of something bigger.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes past Five o'clock.

EU/Iran Relations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Joan Ryan.]

9.30 am

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): I appreciate my good fortune in obtaining this debate. It was only a year or so ago that we had another debate on Iran. It is quite fair that after eight years of the so-called efforts of constructive engagement by the British Government and the European Union, we should review the situation with regard to the outcome of that constructive engagement.

First, I shall start with a piece of constructive engagement of my own, although it arose out of difficult circumstances. A year ago last April, two members of the National Council of Resistance of Iran, who were in Syria on proper visas, were arrested by the Syrian Government. Their names are Ibrahim Khodabandeh and Jamil Bassam. They were political refugees in Britain, and had been so—in the case of Ibrahim—even before the revolution and the removal of the Shah.

They were illegally handed over to the Iranian Government, who for many weeks did not admit to having them. Eventually they said that they did have them in custody. After they had been in custody for about a year, I was allowed to visit them, as were Ibrahim Khodabandeh's daughter and her family.

I had been told verbally that I would not get a visit, but having made a formal written request I was surprisingly allowed one. When I got there, I could see that the purpose of the visit was not only for me to speak to Ibrahim Khodabandeh and Jamil Bassam—I was able to, not in completely confidential circumstances but in reasonably private circumstances. However, during my visit from 14 to 17 June, on which I was accompanied by the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor)—my travelling companion, so to speak, although we were looking at the Iranian Government from different sides of the fence—we had several meetings. For example, we met families who claimed that the People's Mujaheddin Organisation of Iran did not allow them to see relatives who were members of the mujaheddin.

We went to the Workers' House of the trade union movement, where we met people who said that they had been injured, or that their relatives had been injured or killed, in attacks made by the mujaheddin in Iran. We also went to the Museum of Martyrs, where we met a charity that works to provide for those who lost breadwinners in the Iran-Iraq war, and in any activities carried out in Iran by the People's Mujaheddin.

We went to the revolutionary tribunal; of course, in any circumstances, the words "revolutionary court" tend to send a shiver down one's spine. I met the judge considering the case against Ibrahim and Jamil, and was assured that everything in Iran's prisons was fine. I then raised the case of Zahra Kazemi, the Canadian photographer of Iranian family who had been battered to death in Evin prison, and was told that judicial proceedings were going on. Originally, her death was attributed to an accident, but two Iranian Government officials in the prison were then tried. However, after we got back, at the end of June or perhaps the beginning of July, we found out that the Canadian Government were not allowed to have representatives in the courtroom, that the trial was cut short, and that no one was found guilty of anything. That is a comment on Iranian justice.

I also was taken to a demonstration outside the French embassy by those who claimed that they had been hurt in some way by the activities of the PMOI in Iran and who were seeking redress in French courts. So far as I know, nothing has come of that.

I also met Mohsen Mirdamadi, an ex-reformist MP whom the Council of Guardians had prevented from standing in the February elections. He was one of many reformist MPs prevented from standing. Iran's system of democracy is still very much in its infancy if the Council of Guardians can prevent those who had spoken up against certain aspects of the regime from standing for election.

I tried unsuccessfully to meet the deputy head of the judiciary, Mr. Larijani, but I did meet Dr. Araghchi, whom I suppose we would call the Minister for Western European Affairs. I put it to him that the two political prisoners were illegally handed over to the Iranian regime and should be returned to the United Kingdom; if Iran was confident of its case, it could make an application to our courts. After all, the PMOI is on our terrorist list; if we thought that a case had been made, we could return them to Iran in a proper judicial manner. I am still awaiting the outcome of that request.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is talking about constituents of mine and of the hon. Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis). I applaud the hon. Gentleman's efforts—indeed, we are both very grateful for what he has done—but would he not agree that the real test will be whether those two prisoners are returned to this country? If they are not, there should be no question—I for one certainly will not be doing so—of trying to co-operate in any way with the Iranian regime.

Mr. Griffiths: That is important because the case, or the individual cases, could test the whole idea of constructive engagement, and of whether the Iranian Government are really determined to introduce equality before the law, and justice for their citizens. Yes, it is a good test of whether that can happen, and I certainly hope that it does.

My visit was incredibly badly reported on various websites, and I spent quite a lot of time issuing rebuttals to things that had been said. To give one example, it was said that the National Council of Resistance of Iran had tried to prevent me from going. Not only did the council not prevent me, but it was positive and helpful in providing information and so on for my visit. That is the sort of thing that I have had to contend with since my return.

One important element relating to what has just been said is that a senior member of the prison service, Mr Haj Mortezr, was present at one of our meetings.

[Mr. Griffiths]

We had three meal-time meetings—two with one prisoner and one with both. An official statement was read out, mainly for my ears rather than for the benefit of the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East, although he was listening carefully, saying that amnesty would be granted to any member of the PMOI who returned to Iran. I explained that that was fine and that it had been spoken of before, but that given the 20 years of hostility, deep distress and broken promises, it would not merely be a matter of people returning to Iran. There would have to be a properly negotiated settlement and a properly monitored return. Before such things could happen, the prisoners Ibrahim and Jamil would have to be returned to the UK, to show that the Iranian regime was making a positive effort to turn things around.

I am very grateful to the Iranian Government for having allowed me to go. That was part of the process that has been going on for eight years—we are given some hope, then we are sat on pretty firmly, and it is a struggle to find a way to secure a positive outcome. I am still doing that with regard to Ibrahim and Jamil. When I returned, I had a meeting for about an hour and a half with the Iranian ambassador. I then wrote to him to take up the issue of the amnesty, and how we should proceed with the return of the two prisoners to the UK so that their case could be tested in our courts. All that is still going on, and the PMOI is still on our terrorist list and that of the EU. Events have moved on since July, and we should think about removing it from those lists. I shall return to that later.

I now want to discuss the outcome of the eight years of constructive engagement.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): To avoid misunderstanding, would the hon. Gentleman make it abundantly clear that the NCRI is the political wing of the Mojahedin-e Khalq—or MKO—which has been classified by Britain, America and Europe as a terrorist organisation on the basis of the most appalling terrorist incidents, of which we have details? I can supply many more—it is all clarified in a book that I have here, and of which I think the hon. Gentleman has a copy.

Mr. Griffiths: I was not given a copy of that book; I do not know why the hon. Gentleman received one and I did not, but he will know that in Iran I was challenged on many occasions to explain why I support the PMOI. I frankly told my hosts that their Government had been responsible for killing many, perhaps over 100,000, members of the People's Mujaheddin, and that in 1988 there had been a particularly savage murder, the slaughter of about 30,000 political prisoners. A religious fatwa was issued by Ayatollah Khomeini, part of which stated:

> "It is decreed that those who are in prisons throughout the country and remain steadfast in their support for the [mujaheddin] are waging war on God and must be executed."

More people were killed in that series of executions in 1988 than are listed in the book that the hon. Gentleman has in front of him. Yes, I am mindful of the fact that this violent military argument has been going on for a long time. Such arguments and disputes have gone on in many parts of the world where there have been hatred and bloodletting. However, there have been agreements in the end. Think of South Africa, where the African National Congress had a military wing, Umkhonto we Sizwe, and Nelson Mandela stayed in prison for 27 years because he would not give up the concept of the armed struggle.

In this country, there have been negotiations to try to bring to an end the long, bloody conflict in Northern Ireland. All that I have said about constructive engagement is in the context of trying to find real change in the relationships between the European Union and Iran, and between the NCRI and its members, of which the PMOI is the largest—there are four or five others. We need to find a way to bring the current violent period to an end.

The issue of human rights has dogged the post-Shah period from the very beginning.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) gives way, I ask Members who use acronyms to use them in full the first time to give the Hansard transcribers a chance.

Mr. Drew: I shall try not to use an acronym, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend makes a powerful case. Would he also accept that the measure of the quality of a democracy is how it treats its minorities? Iran's treatment of its Christian minority is utterly disgraceful. Would he care to comment on that as well?

Mr. Griffiths: As in so many cases, there are always two aspects. The Iranian Government point to churches in Tehran where Christians are allowed to worship; on the other hand, I know of cases of Christians and other minorities being persecuted.

In that context I would like to mention the persecution of followers of Baha'i. Our Government have been strong in trying to change the Iranian Government's attitude to Baha'i, but there has been a long history of persecution, which has intensified markedly this year, since the removal of virtually all the reformists from the Iranian Parliament. For example, followers of Baha'i are denied access to higher education. About 800 of those who took the exam for university this year and were accepted found that when they received their acceptance notices they had been listed as Muslims. They said, "Sorry, we're not Muslims, we're Baha'i," but were told, "Well in that case you can't go to university." Progress on the treatment of followers of Baha'i ought to be a litmus test of how the Iranian Government intend to commit themselves to improving human rights—indeed, it could even be a test of the success of the EU-Iran dialogue on human rights.

The Canadian Government do not have the PMOI on a terrorist list—not all Governments in the world do. This year they are sponsoring a resolution on Iran at the UN General Assembly session—I cannot remember whether it is the 55th or the 59th—to raise many issues relating to human rights and the treatment of the Baha'i faith. In years past, but not in the past few, the EU has supported resolutions on Iran, but again last year it did not. I hope that there will be total EU support this year for a resolution on Iran, as a way of raising the prospect of the Iranian Government responding positively on such issues.

When we consider the events of the past year in Iran, we can only say that, unfortunately, the human rights situation appears to be deteriorating. Since March this year, the regime has announced more than 100 executions—the figure is taken from official, Government papers—many of which have been carried out in public. One or two cases have been highly publicised. For example, on 15 August, a 16-year-old girl was hanged in public. She was charged with acts incompatible with chastity. In another town called Marivan in western Iran, a 13-year-old girl was sentenced to execution by stoning because she was allegedly made pregnant through an incestuous relationship. She was stoned, but it seems that the person who committed the misdeed was not brought before the courts.

I mentioned Zahara Kazemi and the fact that the trial of the two people who allegedly caused her death in prison was brought to an end without any public viewing. It seems that she was battered to death, but that the Iranian Government accept that she was killed by falling down and hitting her head on a stone floor, even though her recorded injuries were more than would have been caused simply by falling down.The human rights situation is not good.

The UN rapporteur of the working group on arbitrary detention, Louis Joinet, was in Iran in 2003. On his return, he said:

"There were probably more members of the mujaheddin being held in ward 209 of Evin Prison whom we were unable to see. We believe that the treatment of those held in this ward is inhumane and contrary to human rights."

While I was there, on 14 and 15 June, the EU-Iran dialogue was going on in Tehran. On 11 October, the General Affairs and External Relations Council adopted a resolution on the conclusions drawn following the dialogue. It stated:

"The Council remains deeply concerned that despite this commitment, serious violations of human rights are continuing to occur in Iran" and that

"little overall progress has been achieved since the start of the dialogue in December 2002."

It added that

"little progress has been made on implementing the recommendations arising from" the visits of UN special rapporteurs.

It went on to say:

"The Council noted that the situation with regard to the exercise of key civil rights and political freedoms, such as freedom of expression, has deteriorated since the Parliamentary elections of February this year. The Council . . . expressed its concern about the recently increased number of reports about execution being carried out in apparent absence of respect for internationally recognised safeguards, and about the executions of juvenile offenders. It regretted that . . . discriminatory practices continue against women as well as against persons belonging to religious minorities, both recognised and not recognised by Iran."

I conclude with this quote:

"The Council further reaffirmed its position of principle that the dialogue remains without prejudice to the tabling of a resolution at the UN Commission on Human Rights or at the Third Committee of the UN General Assembly. It agreed that at the 59th session of the UN General Assembly, the EU will convey its deep concern at the serious violations of human rights in Iran."

After eight years, there has been little, if any, progress.

I now come to the nuclear issue, which is one of concern and which has received much publicity recently. This ongoing debate was not much of an issue until the NCRI announced that the Iranians have a secret nuclear programme, and that there was a possibility of them enriching uranium and plutonium to make weapons-grade materials. Then, of course, the Americans, with their satellite technology, focused on the places mentioned, and it was all confirmed. Since then, the Iranians have revealed some things, but not everything, and it is only as a result of inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency that more has come to light.

The so-called EU three thought that they were on the verge of getting the Iranians to accept that they should give up their enrichment programme, and although the Americans were trying to take an even stronger line, the EU thought that it had achieved a workable compromise. However, we now read in the Iranian press that Iran intends to carry on with its uranium-enrichment activities. Hossein Mousavian said:

"Iran is not prepared for cessation—any package including a cessation of fuel cycle work would be rejected".

The Iranian press—not only the Government press, but what could be regarded as the reformist press—has made it clear that the Iranians should stand firm.

Again, this is a major issue, and I hope that the UK Government will consider it. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has expressed concerns, and in an interview on Radio 4 on 4 July, he talked about us taking "two steps forward and it's sometimes two back as well".

He also expressed some optimism. Like him, I am an optimist, and I hope that there will be some positive outcomes from these revelations about a programme that could have resulted in the Iranians getting nuclear weapons.

There are some worrying signs given the situation in Iran. From reports in the press, it is clear that the Government of Iran have used the chaos following our invasion of Iraq to send in a lot of their people. Thousands of armed operatives have gone into Iraq, and there is an extensive clandestine intelligence network in the country. It has been suggested that Iran has moved into the best position for decades to influence the political shape of Iraq. Indeed, on 20 July, Iraq's Defence Minister himself, Hazem Shaalan, said:

"Iranian intrusion has been vast and unprecedented since the establishment of the Iraqi state. Generally speaking, Iranians have penetrated the country's sensitive centres and set up many intelligence and security centres in Iraq."

That is the position, and it is a cause of great concern. The matter must be pursued at diplomatic level to see whether we can get to the bottom of it and remove that Iranian influence.

[Mr. Griffiths]

I return to the terrorist tag on the PMOI. Even though it did not participate in any of the fighting, it was bombed in the war. Since then, the Americans have taken over its camp at Ashraf and have interviewed thousands of its members there. The Americans' conclusion, which was published on 27 July in The New York Times, stated:

> "A-16 month review by the United States has found no basis to charge members of an Iranian opposition group in Iraq with violation of American law."

The newspaper also quoted senior American officials as saying that

> "extensive interviews by officials of the State Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation had not come up with any basis to bring charges against any members of the group."

The group—the PMOI—has now been granted protected status under the United Nations convention. A proclamation dated 2 July

> "by the Commander, Multi-National Forces—Iraq, on the Signing of the 'Agreement for the Individuals of the People's Mujahedin of Iran . . . ' at Ashraf" begins

> "To the residents of Ashraf
> The United States has confirmed your status as 'protected persons' under the Fourth Geneva Convention".

The interesting thing in relation to the terrorist tag is that as part of the agreement the people at Camp Ashraf have rejected participation in or support for terrorism; they have given up all their military equipment and weapons; they have rejected violence and will not unlawfully take up arms or engage in any hostile act.

I have a copy of the document that those people are signing, probably at this very moment. There is a very strong case for the European Union to remove the terrorist tag, because they have been accepted as protected persons, and have said that they will not engage in or support terrorism or violence; they have also given up their arms. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend the Minister will announce that positive steps will be taken on that point, and that there will be renewed efforts to make constructive engagement work or to find another way of peacefully allowing democracy to continue.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Am I correct in assuming that the piece of paper to which my hon. Friend referred—the certificate from a United States general—has been given on behalf of the coalition? This may be a matter of joined-up government. It appears that the coalition, of which we are a part, and which the Minister represents this morning, has given the relevant people in Iraq a clean bill of health with respect to terrorism. Perhaps the Minister and my hon. Friend will pick up on that point.

Mr. Griffiths: I confirm that the proclamation is made by

on the signing of the agreement. It is on behalf of the multinational forces. Just as, in the case of Ibrahim Khodabandeh and Jamil Bassam, I am looking for a gesture from the Iranian Government to allow them back to Britain so that judicial and democratic processes can work properly, signalling a new departure by the Government of Iran, I hope that our Government and the EU will begin to play a more positive part.

I appreciate that there are tremendous difficulties. I have suffered and faced them myself during my visit and in things that have transpired since. However, I certainly hope for new and positive measures, perhaps to enable the people of Iran to take part in a referendum on democracy, and to engage in open debate about the type of democracy that they want.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no power to impose any time limits, but, as hon. Members can see, there are many who want to take part in the debate. Brevity may allow everyone to be included.

10.3 am

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I shall be as brief as possible. First, I have the highest regard for the integrity of the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths). He is one of the few Labour Members for whom I would vote, because I know that he is a man of principle, although I disagree fundamentally with his views on Iran. I have had the highest regard for him in many years in the House.

I have three brief points to make. First, we have an obligation to Iran. When we were engaged in discussions about the Iraq invasion I checked quite a bit of material about the war of 1980 to 1988 and the invasion of Iran by Iraq. The plain fact is that the western powers were, at that time, giving full support in every way to Saddam Hussein. I have a list of all the appalling weapons of mass destruction, including anthrax, with which the United States Government provided Saddam Hussein. I mentioned them in our debate on Iraq last March. We have an obligation to appreciate that we are not innocent parties on this issue.

My second point, which I hope the Minister will at least discuss and perhaps study, even if he does nothing about it, relates to today's motion on the European Union. I hope that the Minister will make a special point of carefully considering the Funding for Peace Coalition paper, which I am sure he will have read, on the vast amounts of money that the EU gives to the Palestinian Authority that go straight into funding terrorism.

The publication is not simply one of those argumentative pieces, but a pamphlet that goes into great detail. It mentions names, amounts, and how, because of the sheer inefficiency of the EU in managing its funds, a vast amount of money goes towards the purpose that I mentioned. It says, for example, that 60 per cent. of the PA budget was supported by overseas donations, and that, last year, the EU gave £112 million to the PA. It mentions in particular how the funding goes in various ways to al-Aqsa Martyrs and to other terrorist organisations.

Of the many members of the PA-funded militias involved in acts of terror against civilians, including Europeans, the most notable is Marwan Barghouti, the leader of Fatah-Tanzim, who was convicted on charges of murder and yet is still, unbelievably, drawing a salary from the European-supported PA budget. It is all there in great detail in the paper, which I hope the Minister will study. If he has not seen it, I will be glad to give him a copy.

My third point relates to Iran and to the MKO—or MEK—and other terrorist organisations. Here, again, the EU has a responsibility, because the headquarters of those organisations were in France for a time until the EU recognised that they were nasty, serious terrorist organisations, and they left as a result. They went to Iraq, which, as we know, has had an obsession with Iran for many years. First, are they innocent, decent and respectable people? The groups' worldwide campaign against the Iranian Government stresses propaganda and occasionally uses terrorism. In the 1970s, the MKO/MEK killed US military personnel and US civilians working on defence projects in Tehran. It also supported the 1979 takeover of the US embassy in Tehran.

In 1981, the MKO/MEK placed bombs in the head office of the Islamic Republican party and the Premier's office that killed some 70 high-ranking Iranian officials.

Mr. Griffiths: Unfortunately, there are different truths on either side of the fence in all these activities—let us call them wars. The People's Mujahedin of Iran, or the followers of Mr Rajavi, were not accused of the particular incident to which the hon. Gentleman refers until some time afterwards. In fact, the Iranian Government originally accused other elements of that attack. They focused on the supporters of Mr Rajavi only later, for, I believe, political purposes.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I fully appreciate that there are different views. That is why I do not go in for propaganda on these issues. I do not listen to what organisations say, but take different quotations provided by the Library's research department. All I can say is that I have the full details of all the activities provided by the Library, which is excellent when one is trying to find out the truth, as the hon. Gentleman will know. I will be only too glad to give him all this information if he so wishes.

On the question of the MKO/MEK and its activities in Iran, I have the paper that I mentioned. I urge anyone to read it before they take a firm line on the matter, as it details the people involved in terrorism. The hon. Gentleman and I took out for a meal a gentleman who was sentenced to, I believe, 33 years' imprisonment for killing two children in one of these activities. Sadly, the paper details a huge number of the organisation's activities that involve terrorism. That is frightening, and we should not ignore it.

Time is short, so I shall make only two more points. First, does the Minister accept that by and large Iran has a good reputation in many areas? I was impressed—this might surprise people—to find out that while some Arab countries have terrible problems in religious matters, in Iran we saw a synagogue—there are five. There is a large Jewish community, which has freedom to worship, and there are many Christian churches. I met the people coming out of one of them and asked whether they had any problems. They replied, "Absolutely none."

My second point is about the nuclear issue. I accept that it is always difficult to arrive at the truth in such matters. However, the only way in which we can make progress is to treat countries with respect. Could the Government not suggest that there might be merit in calling a conference to promote the middle east as an atomic-free zone? That would involve Israel and others in getting rid of atomic weapons, but it would be a way of making progress, which will not happen if things continue as they are.

Finally, is there not a case for the Government to make it abundantly clear that the terrorist organisation MKO has little support in Iran? The impression I gained—I am in no sense an expert—was that public opinion, which used to be supportive to an extent, turned against it because, unfortunately, the MEK and the MKO supported Iraq at the time of the invasion of Iran. There is no question—there are detailed allegations in a House of Commons paper—but that they not only gave it support but were involved in the armed conflict. What is the Minister's assessment of the support of the people of Iran for that organisation? My impression is that it is meaningless.

My final point is about universities. We had the pleasure of visiting some. I was impressed to find out that university education is a big factor in Iran. Many people attend, and receive free education—unlike those in the United Kingdom, who have to pay a great deal. Remarkably, more than half the students were women. Speaking to the students, I got the impression that the universities, far from being extreme organisations putting forward extremist views, are highly motivated educational institutions.

I hope that the Government will take a positive attitude towards Iran. It has a form of democracy. Although it is not total, there is an elected parliament and an elected president, and public opinion counts for a great deal. After the cases in which people were prevented from standing—we met one of them—we were told that it was thought that that would never happen again because of the public response.

My final point—I recognise that I have made a final point three times—is that one gets an impression of a country by walking around its streets. There are some deplorable countries in the middle east, where I feel terrified to walk, but in Iran my general impression was of a civilised society with high standards. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that we will not co-operate in any way with terrorist organisations, and that we respect Iran for the many positive developments there.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I ask hon. Members to be as brief as they can. The object of these debates is to allow adequate time for the hon. Member initiating them to receive a reply from the Minister.

10.14 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I shall try to be brief. I shall concentrate on Iran's nuclear capacity, which my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) touched upon. There is no doubt that Iran will move to the top of the political agenda, and that that will almost certainly occur after the presidential election in the United States. It will be driven there by the preoccupation in Washington—on all sides—that the nuclear issue has to be dealt with.

[Tony Lloyd]

It is in our interests and those of the European Union that the EU should engage with the issue at the moment. We should have the sort of debate on the handling of Iran—if that is the right expression—that we failed to have in the case of Iraq; we learned a lesson there.

In recent years, the United States and the European Union have approached Iran in different ways. Essentially, the European Union has handled Iran in a much more intelligent fashion than has the United States, partly because the United States has varied in what it has sought to achieve, and how it has gone about it. Sometimes it has engaged in intense co-operation, as, for example, over Afghanistan; at other times it has been very distant. However, the EU, the United States and, indeed, countries such as Russia, must deal collectively with the nuclear situation in Iran.

The evidence is that Iran is at least in a position to move towards obtaining nuclear weapons, which, given its strategic situation, ought to be unthinkable. That would almost certainly lead to a nuclear arms race in the region, with countries such as Turkey, possibly Saudi Arabia and even the Syrians looking to obtain a similar capacity. That would be massively destabilising in a region that is already unstable, and the response of Israel would of course be difficult to predict.

Is military action an option, as in Iraq? Of course, all things are possible, but experience in Iraq should warn us of the enormous dangers. That said, Iran is not Iraq. It has a millenniums-old tradition and it is cohesive; indeed, it was prepared to accept up to 1 million casualties in the Iran-Iraq war in fighting for its national integrity. So, at this stage at least, most of us would say that the direction that the United States and others will want to take if Iran is not prepared to move forward would be the worst possible option, although we would not reject it in all circumstances.

If the European Union can begin serious dialogue with the United States and places such as Moscow, and, most importantly, maintain its serious dialogue with Tehran, we could set out something like a road map, making it clear to the Iranians what they would get from moving in a positive direction. We would have to take account, for example, of the fact that Iran would look for security guarantees in its own region, and the United States would obviously have to play a fundamental role in implementing such guarantees, particularly given its extraordinary influence over Israel. However, Iran is entitled to security in its own region, and it is also entitled to recognition and access in economic and social terms. In that respect, there is a lesson for the Americans, because the EU has already offered the possibility of progress on such issues.

In response, however, Iran must attend to the agenda that has been discussed this morning, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend. It will be fundamental to any dialogue that Iran move forward and clearly disavow its nuclear programme, and that means that it must be much more ready to accept proper inspection regimes. It would also have to move significantly on the human rights issues to which my hon. Friend referred; that, too, will be fundamental to any dialogue.

I have tried to be brief so that other hon. Members can speak. I simply conclude as I began by saying that Iran will be at the top of all our agendas within six months, almost irrespective of what happens in the American election. If Europeans do not begin to take Iran seriously now, we will have lost influence by the time the debate begins in the United States. If we are to take a cohesive approach at the global level, the time to do so is now.

10.18 am

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for raising the important issue of the European Union's relationship with and policies towards Iran. The human rights situation there has been deteriorating for the past three years, and probably longer, which was confirmed by the outgoing EU Commissioner, Chris Patten, who is deeply concerned about reverses in human rights in Iran.

I also want to put on record the statement by the Iraqi Defence Minister—not the coalition forces—that there has been a vast intrusion into Iraq by Iranians since the fall of Saddam Hussein. Given all the information that I have garnered, including from the research facilities of our excellent Library, I have every reason to believe that Iran can produce enough weapons-grade uranium for a nuclear bomb within a year. I merely say to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor)—whom I greatly respect—that Iran has spurned repeated attempts by the European Union to find a diplomatic solution to that nuclear crisis.

I have every reason to believe that Iran, or people from Iran, have taken control of many Palestinian terrorist cells. The hon. Member for Bridgend mentioned some abuses of human rights; I need not repeat them, except to mention that at least 120 people have been publicly executed since March. It is on record that about 120,000 members of the People's Mujaheddin Organisation of Iran have been executed in the past 20 years. One has only to study the articles in Iran's penal code to see how far that country disrespects human rights.

The acquisition, development and stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction have been a central policy of the Iranian regime. To say the least, their Government have been forked tongued over the issue. They have spurned attempts at a diplomatic solution, and denied and hidden evidence on the one hand and then, on the other, proudly boasted that they have two nuclear weapons programme sites.

I want to stress my gratitude to the hon. Member for Bridgend for all that he has done to try to secure the release of one my constituents, Mr. Khodabandeh.

I have one other thing to say, and that is about religious tolerance. I cannot think of any religious organisation that contains so many peace-loving, kindly and gentle people as the Baha'i faith, although I like to think that they all do. The Baha'i faith has 6 million adherents in 235 countries; some, I am sure, in all our constituencies. There are up to 350,000 in Iran, which is the birthplace of the Baha'i faith.

The Baha'is—and maybe other groups—have consistently been denied access to higher education. Early last August, the Baha'i community in Iran learned that the Iranian authorities have now ordered the Baha'is to suspend all educational activities and to close the Baha'i Institute for Higher Education. It has been the policy of the European Union, and the United Kingdom, to engage with the Iranian regime to seek trade and to try to release the tensions between the west and that great country. I believe that that policy was wrong and ill considered.

I hope that the EU and the UK Government will change their tune on Iran, given the dreadful persecutions and violations of human rights that have consistently taken place in that country over a long time.

Dr. Vis rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman promises to take no more than three minutes, he may speak.

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing this vital debate. I thank him profoundly for informing me over the years of the politics of this rich country, Iran, where most of the people are desperately poor. He has raised many aspects of the inhumanity of the present regime in Iran, and to my mind the central aspect of his contributions is his analysis of why the People's Mujaheddin Organisation of Iran should be removed from the British, EU and United States terror lists. That would be in the interests of the PMOI and of all the democracies in the world, and would send shockwaves through the oppressive regime of the mullahs in Iran. They would no longer be able to hide behind the smokescreen that allows them to argue that the EU and the USA agree with their regime. As my hon. Friend said, by labelling Iran's principal opposition as terrorists, the EU and the USA have distanced themselves from the Iranian people.

The Iranian people share the objectives of the president-elect in waiting, Mrs Maryam Rajavi, and support her policies, central to which are democracy, equality, human rights and accountability. One aspect is also worth stressing. The Government in waiting, with their headquarters near Paris, would recognise the state of Israel and would strive for a two-state solution, which is to say, a safe state of Israel and a safe, viable and democratic state for Palestine. Such an outcome, which seems so distant at present, would be of enormous benefit for the entire middle east region and beyond. It would also be a major blow for all the terrorist groups in the middle east and beyond that are financially supported by the mullahs.

I repeat what I see as the main contribution of today's debate: the request to the USA, the EU and the UK to remove the PMOI from the list of international terrorists. That would be a major achievement towards peace in the world and something in which the UK, the EU and the USA should be most interested.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): This has been an important debate and, like others, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing it and introducing it in truly comprehensive style. The valuable insight that he and the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) drew from their trip to Iran has enhanced the quality of the debate enormously.

Iran's significance is lost on none of us. To take a short-term perspective, Iran has been at the centre of many key events in the past century: western involvement in regime change, then Islamic revolution and, more recently, the Iran-Iraq war. Taking a wider sweep of history, we see that Iran has always made a striking contribution, not least to the development of learning and culture across the world. Iran is of huge strategic significance to its region and the globe. To put the matter simply, Iran, with its oil and gas reserves and central location in one of the most sensitive areas of the world, has an influence way beyond its borders. Sadly, Iran also finds itself at a key junction on the international drugs routes.

In its recent report, the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs described Iran as > "half in and half out of the international community."

For all our past and current difficulties, constructive engagement is important for the UK, the European Union and the broader international community, so that Iran can be fully engaged internationally.

A number of hon. Members have focused their comments on nuclear weapons, which must be our most pressing concern. Despite its huge oil and gas reserves, Iran is known to have been developing a nuclear capability for some time. The regime has always protested that the programme is peaceful and civil, and consistent with its obligations under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. However, the International Atomic Energy Agency's visit in February 2003 cast serious doubts on that claim and its work since has reinforced our legitimate anxieties about Iran's capability and intentions. Recent reports of Iran's ability to build and fire missiles have added to those concerns.

Inside Iran, of course, many arguments are made in favour of developing nuclear weapons. To the east, neighbouring Pakistan and nearby India are known to have nuclear weapons. To the west, Israel has had a nuclear programme for a generation or more. Around the region, the United States and its coalition partners have a strategic presence in Iraq and Afghanistan, countries that border Iran.

Compelling as those issues may appear, none can override Iran's obligations under the non-proliferation treaty. Nor can they justify the massive escalation in the arms race that Iran's possession of nuclear weapons would represent for the region and the world. For those reasons, the international community has spent much of the past 18 months urgently attempting to persuade Iran to comply with international law. It was right to do so.

History suggests that engagement with Iran is best done through careful diplomacy. Efforts by the United Kingdom, France and Germany have been extremely important in that regard, and I applaud the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for their work.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

The EU three have made significant progress in brokering a deal with Iran to suspend its nuclear programme and to allow greater access to IAEA inspectors. The signing of the additional protocols to the safeguards agreement was a key development. The deal offered the prospect of Iran ending its uranium enrichment activities in return for guarantees that it could import all the nuclear fuel required for a civil nuclear programme. However, throughout 2004 the Iranians have been resiling on the agreement, which its Parliament has never ratified.

Critical reports were made by the IAEA in March and June; they were followed by an announcement in July that Iran would resume manufacture of centrifuges, which are critical to the enrichment process. Further criticism was made in the IAEA's September report, which set the scene for an important decision by its council when it meets in November.

Throughout the past few months, the EU's position has appeared to unravel, and it seems to be without a plan B. There is increasing American pressure for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council, with threats in the background of what that might lead to. So far the EU has properly resisted that pressure, but it seems that the EU has been offering only carrots and the US only sticks. We need hard-edged constructive engagement from now on. We can offer improved trade and investment, and ultimately perhaps an EU trade and co-operation agreement, but we must also set out penalties, with the prospect of sanctions if Iran fails to comply with its obligations. Iran already has a high value of trade with the EU, which allows that prospect; it seems anxious at present to avoid such sanctions.

The Iranians are rightly concerned about the middle east peace process and the ongoing conflict in Iraq. It behoves the west—the European Union and the United States—to make serious progress in the middle east. We must demonstrate that we will tackle issues there even-handedly. Perhaps next year's conference review of the non-proliferation treaty will offer us an opportunity to confront the undoubted double standards that now exist.

Others have mentioned human rights issues; I echo what they said. To put it mildly, the elections in February were a disappointment. In political terms, Iran seems to have been going backwards since then. Many eloquent testimonies have been given about the infringement of personal freedoms, and the worrying increase in executions throughout the country. We must ask Iran to address these serious issues.

We have reached a critical moment. Human rights is a key issue between the EU and Iran. There are also concerns about drug trafficking and links to terrorism. Most frightening of all, however, is the possibility—even the prospect—of Iran developing nuclear weapons. The EU must continue to engage peacefully with Iran as we tackle that threat. The engagement must be hard edged: on one hand, there must be clear opportunities for civil and nuclear developments supported by the prospects of greater trade and investment; on the other, there must be a serious intent to use sanctions.

Iran is a serious country and we must take it seriously, but all parties must also know that we will act seriously as well.

10.35 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): This short but useful debate has amply illustrated the complexity of relations with Iran and the sensitivity of the challenges that we face. I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on securing it.

Iran will, undoubtedly, be one of the greatest foreign policy challenges of the next Parliament and, indeed, of the next presidential term in the United States. If we get our policy towards Iran wrong, the result will be more conflict, more instability in the middle east and the added threat of nuclear weapons. If we get it right, however, there is the prize of an open and democratic Iran, a force for stability in the wider region and a country with which we can trade and co-operate freely. The stakes are therefore high.

I want to make it clear that I do not doubt the Iranian people's will for peace. It is also very clear that Iran sees the benefits of reaching a trade and co-operation agreement with the European Union. To date, however, too many members of the Iranian Government have found confrontation easier than engagement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) spoke of the positive aspects of Iran and the importance of positive engagement. The Opposition supported the Foreign Secretary on his visit to Iran last year with his French and German counterparts. That act of engagement was a brave act that held out the prospect of a new relationship with Iran and an end to its military nuclear programme.

We must, however, now recognise that that strategy of engagement has nearly run into the sand. Iran has reneged on its commitments to the international community and to the International Atomic Energy Agency by continuing to pursue nuclear technology that would enable it to become a nuclear power. Iran enriches uranium far above levels needed for a purely peaceful nuclear programme. The heavy water reactor in Arak is a cause for concern, and the scale of the centrifuge plant at Natanz is suspicious. Iran also continues to enhance its ballistic missile capability. This is all cause for the most serious concern. It is rumoured that the Iranian Government have ordered that the first nuclear bomb should be ready by the middle of next year. Does the Minister believe that to be accurate and, if so, is Iran on course to achieve that threat?

Our anxiety must not be limited to Iraq's weapons programmes. As several hon. Members on both sides of the House have shown, the human rights situation appears to be deteriorating again, particularly since the beginning of this year. That was exemplified recently by the execution of the young girl to whom the hon. Member for Bridgend referred in his opening address.

Worsening human rights appear to be matched by the declining strength of reformist forces in Iran and the reassertion by radical hardliners of control over the Iranian Government. Press freedom has been further constrained in recent years. The daily newspaper Bahar, for example, was closed in 2003. The Tehran public court claimed that the newspaper had "insulted the authorities." On the same day, the special court of the clergy closed another journal and arrested two members of the editorial board whose whereabouts, so far as I am aware, remain unknown. The Minister might have more up-to-date information on that.

There have been difficulties in our bilateral relationship, too, not least of which was the seizure of eight British servicemen and their equipment earlier this year. Everyone was delighted that the servicemen were returned safely, albeit after their public humiliation. Their equipment, however, was not returned. The Government have been very quiet about that, and I hope the Minister will update us about their efforts to see our equipment returned.

The situation is difficult, but at least we know what we want to achieve. I believe that there is very little difference between Members on both sides of the House about what our goals should be: friendly relations with an Iran that is nuclear weapons free, stable, respectful of human rights and on the road to true democracy. That goal is also shared by our partners in the EU and more widely across the Atlantic. We can achieve it only by working with our European partners and the United States.

In the past couple of years, a worrying state of affairs has developed in Iran's relations with the wider world. An impression appears to have developed that Iran has nothing to lose by snubbing the Europeans and nothing to gain by engaging with the US. While that impression persists, we may be doomed to unproductive confrontation.

In that context, will the Minister elaborate on the current Russian diplomatic initiative and its implications? The Russian Foreign Minister has visited Iran during the past fortnight, paving the way for a visit by President Putin next month. What assessment have the Government made of the prospects for success in persuading the Iranians to end their nuclear enrichment programme and submit to IAEA inspection? If the Russians reach such a deal, will the trade-off be the retention of a civil nuclear programme in the shape of the existing, although inactive, power plant and a second nuclear reactor using Russian technology? If that is the case, what steps can the Minister promise to ensure that the civil nuclear programme will not be used to allow the development of nuclear weapons to resume in future?

Bearing in mind the comments of the hon. Member for Bridgend about close involvement of Iranian nationals in Iraq, I ask the Minister whether there is evidence of personnel or equipment from Iraq's nuclear programme having found their way to Iran, either directly or through a third country. Is there evidence to support recent press comment that Iraqi nuclear weapons technology would be sold to Iran by Syria?

As the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) said, we are approaching a crossroads in our dealings with Iran. Our relations are likely either to improve or to get markedly worse. I hope that it will be understood on both sides of the Atlantic that crude military measures are likely not simply to be unproductive, but perhaps to be counter-productive. They might delay Iran's nuclear programme but they would not stop it. They would also unite the Iranian people's passionate national pride with hard-liners' hostility to the outside world.

Are the British Government making the case against military action to any who might be tempted to pursue it? Equally, we must make it clear to the Iranian Government—this, too, was mentioned by the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale—that there will be negative consequences if Iran continues to develop a nuclear weapons programme illicitly. Likewise, our dialogue on human rights must be robust, so we need to back up our position with some credible threats of consequences for the Iranian regime.

We and our European partners have expended political capital in obtaining US agreement for talks on improved economic and political ties if Iran suspends its nuclear fuel enrichment programme. I hope that the Minister will tell us how fully behind the talks he believes the American Government to be. If Iran perceived that the US Government were ready to commit to better relations, the chances for the latest round of dialogue would be greatly increased. If agreement were reached, what mechanisms would be put in place to reassure the west that Iran was keeping its side of the agreement?

If agreement is not reached, there must be consequences. Does the Minister believe that, in that case, Iran's nuclear weapons programme should be an urgent matter for discussion by the Security Council, as has already been requested by the US? What measures might the Government recommend if Iran failed to suspend its fuel enrichment programme? Do the Government agree that Iran's further integration in the world economy would certainly have to be halted in those circumstances?

There must, on the other hand, be real incentives for Iran to accept the need to suspend its programme and improve its human rights record. Acceptance of a purely peaceful nuclear programme and improved trade relations with the EU could be enticing parts of such an offer. Such incentives, however, would be enormously more attractive if the Iranian Government believed that they could lead to a constructive relationship with the United States as well. How prepared does the Minister believe the US might be to enter into such a relationship?

We firmly support the Government's readiness to engage with the Iranian Government and we wish them well in one of the most challenging foreign policy arenas, but I hope that they will be prepared to take robust, peaceful action in the event of failure.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for initiating the debate, because it allows me to set out the Government's view of the difficult problem of our relationship—and that of our partners in Europe and other democratic partners—with Iran.

Hon. Members have made constructive speeches. My hon. Friend went to Iran with the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor), but from listening to their speeches it is apparent that they came back with dissimilar analyses of the situation there. That shows us the complexity of what we are dealing with.

[Mr. Denis MacShane]

I shall deal with the specific points that hon. Members made as my speech develops. Some important questions were raised. The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore), speaking for the Liberal Democrats, invited us to get much closer to our European partners. The Foreign Minister of Germany is to meet me and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in exactly an hour. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Iran is top of the agenda.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), speaking for the Conservative party, seemed to suggest that we should be much closer to the United States. I do not dissent; it is the job of Government to find a way of bringing our European partners and our allies and partners in the United States closer together, not to choose to park ourselves in one camp in opposition to the other.

It was good of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend to start by mentioning the individual cases of Ibrahim Khodabandeh and Jamil Bassam. We should never forget that we are talking about citizens of Iran who have elected to be in exile in this country and who now find themselves in prison in Iran. They are not British citizens and we have no legal or consular oversight of them. However, I share the view that there are too many people in prison in Iran for making political statements, and too many executions have taken place, including the awful one of the 16-year-old girl. Such things are not worthy of a democratic, civilised nation and everybody in the European Union would object to them. There was also the death of Zahra Kazemi, the Canadian photographer beaten to death in Iranian police custody last year. That was of great concern to us all, especially to me, as a former president of the National Union of Journalists, to our allies and friends in the Canadian Government and to journalists throughout the world.

It is right that we should put individual cases on record. However, as has been pointed out, Iran is a great country with rather more than a millennium's worth of history and culture. In the region around Iran, we find some of the most important challenges that we face: first, how to make the world safer from global terrorism and weapons of mass destruction; secondly, how to fight the drugs trade, illegal migration and other international crime; thirdly, how to bring about reform and sustainable development in societies undergoing rapid change; and fourthly, but not least, how to support the establishment of stable democracies in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iran's choices about its future and its relations with neighbouring countries can affect the security and prosperity of peoples well beyond the middle east. If, as I hope, Turkey gets a start date for negotiations and joins the European Union, the EU will, in due course, have a frontier with Iran. That is why the British Government and the EU have sought engagement. I do not put an adjective in front of that noun but, as the Prime Minister said in Crawford three years ago, we believe that engagement is the right way forward.

We welcome President Khatami's vision of a democratic Islamic civil society, based on the rule of law, and support those in Iran who wish to bring in reform. We co-operate successfully with Iran in a number of respects—the fact that hon. Members are able to go to the country, to visit its prisons and to have a range of political discussions in Iran is a small sign of that; it was not possible in the past. We can all think of countries that do not correspond to our democratic norms and where such things are still not possible.

We share the view of our EU partners that any development of relations with Iran, which we want to see, must be on the basis of Iranian willingness to address issues of political concern. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) was right to say that we need a united European approach. We also need unity with the United States. I hope that, should problems with Iran develop in a way that we hope they will not, we will not experience again the divisions between the US and Europe that have occurred over Iraq. The two great regions of democracy in the world must march together.

Let me address one of the most pressing issues, which many hon. Members mentioned—Iran's nuclear programme. We do not question the right of any country to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, provided—this is the essential condition—that it complies fully with its obligations. Under the non-proliferation treaty, it is unacceptable for non-nuclear weapons states to seek to acquire nuclear weapons. In the middle east, such efforts could seriously destabilise international peace and security. The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East asked about a nuclear weapons-free middle east, and the United Kingdom Government have always supported UN resolutions calling for such an arrangement.

In the past two years, the International Atomic Energy Agency has documented serious failures by Iran over 18 years to meet its safeguards obligations and be fully transparent with the agency. That has led to widespread concern about whether the ambitions of Iran's nuclear programme are, as the Iranian authorities claim, entirely peaceful. That is not simply a British, German, French or American concern; it is shared by the entire international community, as we have clearly seen from the actions of the IAEA board of governors, whose last six resolutions on Iran have all been adopted by consensus.

The United Kingdom, France and Germany—the so-called EU three—have played a leading role in encouraging Iran to co-operate with the IAEA. Our efforts have been aimed at giving Iran an opportunity to reassure the international community that its nuclear intentions are indeed peaceful. When my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary visited Tehran with his German and French counterparts last October, the Iranian authorities made a solemn commitment that they would take the necessary steps. They promised to be fully transparent with the IAEA and to co-operate in resolving the outstanding issues identified in the director general's reports. They also promised to sign, implement and ratify an additional protocol to the safeguard agreement, which would allow short-notice access by IAEA inspectors to a wider variety of nuclear sites.

Furthermore, Iran promised solemnly to suspend all uranium enrichment-related and reprocessing activities. This last point is crucial. Confidence cannot—I repeat, cannot—be restored unless Iran agrees to suspend its fuel cycle activities, including all centrifuge work and uranium conversion. Such activities are not necessary for a civil nuclear power generation programme, but they would give Iran technologies to help it towards a military nuclear capability.

I should emphasise that the suspension request is specific to Iran because of its past lack of co-operation with the IAEA and the very real doubt that that has created about the real intentions behind its nuclear programme. We do not ask other countries to suspend their enrichment-related activities if there is no reason to doubt their peaceful intentions.

The commitments made by Iran last October were a step in the right direction, but as we said at the time, what matters is not declarations of Iran's willingness, but seeing those declarations turned into reality. Since last year, Iran has supplied the agency with further details of past nuclear activity. It has also signed, but made no attempt to ratify, the additional protocol. We accept that those are significant moves, but as successive IAEA resolutions have made clear, there is much further to go. Important questions remain unresolved, such as the extent of Iran's work on advanced centrifuges and the purposes of its work on plutonium separation.

Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend is right to say that Iran has committed itself to fulfilling certain obligations, but does he accept that there would be a real logic to offering it security guarantees, which would allow it to escape the logic of its nuclear programme?

Mr. MacShane: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but Iran must live up to its specific legal obligations under the different treaties. In other words, it must decide and show the world whether all its work is exclusively for peaceful purposes. That is the question that the entire world wants answered, including President Putin of Russia, who, in a meeting with President Chirac and Chancellor Schröder a few weeks ago at the Sochi resort on the Black sea, said that Russia was determined that Iran should not become a nuclear weapons state.

However, Iran has never suspended fuel cycle activities in a way acceptable to the board. Instead it has quibbled constantly about the scope of suspension and, in June, partially stepped back from its commitments. That is why the international community is more worried than ever. As the Foreign Secretary said in Brussels on 13 September:

> "What Iran has to understand is that it cannot turn the issue of confidence on and off like a tap".

Last month, the board reconsidered Iran's nuclear programme. It would be damaging if the IAEA board, having set out its requirements in successive resolutions, were now to accept less than full compliance. With our encouragement, it decided to give Iran a final chance. Iran now faces a clear choice: live up to its commitments and comply in full with the board's resolutions, including to put in place a full and lasting suspension, and thus reap the benefits of the international confidence that this would create, or spurn this chance to reassure the international community. If that happens, the board will need to discuss additional measures, which will probably include referral to the UN Security Council, at its next meeting. Iran now needs to act decisively before the board meets again on 25 November. Naturally, the Government will keep the House fully informed as those efforts proceed.

The nuclear issue is not the only security question on which we are engaging with Iran. As the EU has made clear, action by Iran against terrorism is also a high priority. We particularly want Iran to play a full role—

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. MacShane: I must get some of these points on record.

We want Iran to play a full role in the international fight against al-Qaeda by sharing information on al-Qaeda members whom it is detaining. We continue to urge the Iranian authorities to ensure that groups engaged in terrorism and violence in Iraq, the Israel/Palestine region and elsewhere do not draw material or political support from inside Iran.

I am dismayed by, and I refute, the inaccurate allegations made by the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East about EU help to Palestine. It does not help his case to make such inaccurate remarks. I will write to him, and will make a copy of my letter available to the House.

We recognise that Iran has legitimate interests in the future of Iraq and Afghanistan. It has played host to more than 2.5 million refugees from those countries. In Afghanistan, we have welcomed Iran's co-operation regarding the recent election and efforts to combat the drugs trade. Iran has played a part in restoring Iraq's economic and religious life, but its leaders have done little in public or private to support the Iraqi Interim Government and their efforts to provide security for the Iraqi people. We are deeply concerned by reports of links between the Iranian regime and armed groups that undermine the rule of law in Iraq.

Iran must also address its human rights record. Like every elected Member of this House, I was deeply disappointed that many candidates, including a quarter of the sitting Deputies, were disqualified from standing in February's parliamentary elections, and was surprised to hear that little attention was paid to that. If some outside body announced that a quarter of the MPs standing for re-election in the House of Commons could not stand, there might be a row involving even the deeply conservative and religious authorities in this country.

We believe in the dialogue between the EU and Iran, but in recent months there have been disturbing new trends in areas such as freedom of expression, the behaviour of the courts and religious freedom. We cannot support the delisting of terrorist organisations outside Iran that have committed atrocities that are crimes against humanity.

I hope that the whole House will send a message of solidarity to people of the Baha'i faith. It is a great, noble, tolerant and peace-loving religion, and its treatment at the hands of the Iranian authorities is an insult to human values anywhere in the world.

Child Support Agency

11 am

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): In my three and a half years as a Member of Parliament, many issues have featured regularly at my weekly surgery, but one that causes misery to many constituents, mostly young mothers and their children, is the problem of dealing with the Child Support Agency. That is why I am delighted to have the chance to raise a number of concerns today. If there are any that the Minister cannot answer this morning, I hope she will contact me when she has the answers.

The problems faced by my constituents are not new. I am sure that many of the issues that I wish to raise today will be familiar to the Minister, not only because of her work in the Department for Work and Pensions but because, like every other hon. Member, she will have listened to her constituents as I have listened to mine. They are usually young mothers, but sometimes fathers, trying to get by and to do their level best for their children—the children of the many ex-partners who refuse to play a part in their children's maintenance.

We often hear of Fathers 4 Justice, in this place as well as outside, but, although they are not so vocal and do not indulge in stunts, many more mothers suffer in silence. They need someone to speak up for them. I hope that this debate will help to raise their profile in an altogether quieter and more measured way. The fact that they do not scream from rooftops, crane-tops or Buckingham palace does not mean that they do not suffer as much, and in many cases more, than those high-profile cases that we hear so much about. However, for as long as the CSA remains unchanged, hon. Members will continue to see problem cases in their surgeries—and Ministers should expect to continue responding to debates such as this.

I am not one of those people who believes that we should approach the CSA in a party political way. Neither the Minister nor I were Members when the Child Support Act 1991 was enacted, but she will know that there was broad cross-party consensus on the creation of the CSA. I would like to see cross-party agreement on its abolition, but I accept that we do not yet seem to have reached that stage. The basic point is that the CSA is not working as well as it should, and for many people it has never worked well.

Only last week, the CSA was described in The Independent as being on the brink of collapse. Having already written off more than £1 billion of arrears as uncollectable, the CSA still owes 500,000 parents a total of some £720 million. There is now a backlog of 30,000 cases, with less than half the amount owed to the CSA this year being collected. To make matters worse, the new £456 million computer system, designed to make the agency more efficient, is struggling to cope. With half the total number of CSA cases, that system is just not doing the job. That is totally unacceptable. This is a service involving children, in some cases very vulnerable children, which makes the situation deplorable.

All hon. Members have their own CSA stories. The most basic problems with the agency can be summed up in a letter that I received from someone living in Corstorphine in my constituency. She wrote:

> "I submitted an application to the Child Support Agency in June 2003, but despite several phone-calls to them, I have had absolutely no communication from them at all. When I phoned in, I was told that my case was being dealt with as a clerical case and that the best way to progress it was to lodge a complaint, which I did. I received a letter acknowledging receipt of the complaint and was told they would be in touch. I didn't hear anything further so at the beginning of December, I tried contacting them again for an update on my case. I spent three hours on the phone getting passed from person to person and not one of them was able to give me any information. I spoke to seven different people and each time, I had to explain the situation only to be told that I'd been put through to the wrong department. I eventually got through to someone who said they would leave a message for the person dealing with my case and he would call me back the following day. I waited over a week and there was not contact so I tried him again and the same thing happened. I was told to phone one number then another and then another. I left another message to be called back and I'm still waiting."

It is disgraceful that people such as my constituent are being left in limbo, with communications left unanswered and messages not responded to.

Far and away the most extraordinary CSA case I have come across is that of one of my constituents in Barnton—a case that is still continuing four years after the original application. In July 2000, my constituent gave the CSA all the necessary documents for a maintenance decision to be taken. After hearing nothing for several weeks she contacted the CSA again, only to be told that they had no documentation about her, and she should send the forms again. A few days later she received a letter from the CSA, returning the very documents that it had told her it had lost, and asking for more information. She phoned the Hastings office, to be told that her case was being dealt with in Falkirk. She then phoned the Falkirk office, to be told that her case was being dealt with in Hastings. Even the staff at the CSA admitted that their dealings with her case had been a bit of a shambles.

Eventually, my constituent's papers were found in the Hastings office. The CSA made a maintenance calculation, but no payments were ever made by her ex-husband to the CSA. Rather than pursuing the ex-partner for payment, the CSA simply added the missed amounts on to future payments. Of course, those payments were not made either. Then, in 2002, two years after the original application was made, the CSA finally got round to making a liability order for payment to the sheriff's office. It took another year for a public auction of my constituent's ex-partner's office goods to be organised. At that auction he handed over a cheque for £1,000 to stop the sale and the auction was cancelled—but what happened next? The cheque to the CSA bounced.

All that is rumbling on, and my constituent rightly queries the exact monthly amount of child maintenance awarded by the agency. She advised the CSA that her ex-husband had extra property from which he was receiving an income, and did additional work for which he received a salary. Those amounts were not included in the CSA's calculations. Yet the CSA chose to ignore that. It appears that it never carried out any investigations to verify the claims.

On 23 July 2003 we requested a full about the CSA findings in my constituent's case, and were told that such information would be provided in 28 days. Despite constant chasers we did not receive that report until 31 December 2003—161 days after the request, which is five times the promised time. While all that was going on, my constituent was not receiving any money. I wrote again to the CSA on 28 June and did not receive a response until, interestingly enough, I secured this Adjournment debate. None the less, four years and three months after the original application, my constituent has not received a penny in child support. Her case is one of the 25 per cent. of CSA cases—a staggering one in four—in which no payments have ever been made.

The delays that my constituent has faced in getting her money are bad enough, but her case also highlights two further systemic problems with the CSA. First, there is a problem with the agency taking ex-partners' declarations of income at face value. There has been a particular problem where the ex-partner is self-employed and it is difficult to verify profits and income independently. I came across another case involving an ex-husband who said that his income was £100 a week, on which basis the CSA calculated maintenance. Yet anyone who looked closely at that man's lifestyle—he had holidays and a new car, and had bought a new house—would see that it could not be supported on £100 a week. Any proper investigation by the CSA would have discovered that, but no investigation took place.

That leads to the second issue: the fact that lack of action by the agency forces the parents with care to become, effectively, private investigators. All too often the CSA leaves it up to parents with care to prove that the income of the non-resident parent is higher than declared, rather than forcing the non-resident parent to prove that their income is as low as they have declared. That simply cannot be right.

The report of the Work and Pensions Committee was pretty damning about the new computer system: £456 million was spent, yet 75,000 cases have been lost or stuck in the system. The contrast is clear. Why are so many cases stuck? Is that an IT problem, a personnel problem or the fault of EDS, the company that supplies the data system? For every individual whose case is stuck, the problem is a major one.

The Committee concluded that CSA customers were receiving "an appalling level of service."

Its findings are borne out by cases in Edinburgh, West, as I am sure they are in every constituency in the country.

One of my constituents, Mrs. Wood, had been receiving regular payments until June this year, when the payments mysteriously stopped. On contacting the CSA she found that that had nothing to do with the money from her ex-partner, as maintenance was still being paid to the CSA. However, for some reason the computer had stopped forwarding payments to her account. Since then, not only has she never received the correct monthly payment, but she has received a new payment schedule that is totally inaccurate. I would like the Minister to go into some detail about whether that is the fault of the IT system. Experience with the CSA shows that it can be difficult enough getting correct payments from some non-resident parents, but surely when the correct payments are made, such as in the case of Mrs. Wood, the CSA should forward those payments, on time and in full.

I want to give the Minister as much time as possible to reply, but before I finish, I want to raise the wider issue of what to do with the CSA as an agency. The Minister will know of my party's long-standing policy of abolishing the CSA and moving its assessment and enforcement functions to the Inland Revenue. Considering the amount of cross-checking the CSA should do with the Inland Revenue, but does not always do, that would seem an entirely practical and sensible proposition. I know that the idea has even received support from some of the Minister's own Back Benchers. I still have not heard a reasonable argument from the Government as to why such a move should not happen. I accept that it would not remedy things overnight. However, it is a serious proposition that could provide the kind of joined-up government that the Minister and her colleagues always promise.

It may be easy to think of child maintenance and the CSA simply in terms of the transfer of money. However, we must never forget the purpose of that money is to protect the many children—in some cases children who remain in poverty—who need and deserve that extra help. As a father, I can never understand parents walking away from their own children and their parental responsibilities. However, we live in the real world—a world in which that absence of responsibility exists.

Although for some people the CSA exists only as a formal means to transfer money, surely the agency's key task is to prevent parents who try to avoid their responsibilities from doing so. That is where the CSA is failing in its most basic of aims: the protection of children. Far too many children are simply not getting the money they need and deserve. Although that is often the fault of the absent parent, the Minister has to accept that in too many cases—tens of thousands of them—children are not getting the help they need because of the direct failure of the CSA to act quickly, effectively or at all.

I accept that the new rules introduced last year are an improvement. However, introducing them is like giving someone a sticking plaster to deal with a broken leg. They have failed to deal with the underlying core problems of the CSA. Tinkering at the edges is not good enough; we need a complete overhaul of the entire system. Until we get that overhaul, I fear that Members of Parliament's postbags will continue to be filled with letters, and their surgeries filled with mothers, fathers and children who are being short-changed by the system. Those people deserve better.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on securing a debate on a subject that is clearly of great importance to the lives of so many families not in only his constituency but in the constituencies of every Member of the House. We all see such cases in our surgeries, one way or another, so we all have an interest in the matter.

I begin by emphasising how committed my ministerial colleagues and I are to trying to create an effective and efficient child support service. I know that we are not there yet—I will say that up-front—and I acknowledge the fact that there are ongoing problems. However, when we can get the new system to work properly and extend its coverage, it will be simpler, more transparent and easier for parents to understand. That should go some way towards making things easier for all parties to accept, and towards changing the staffing emphasis in the CSA from what it too often concentrated on in the past—trying to collect information to make the complex calculation under the old scheme—to compliance; that is, ensuring both that calculations are made and that money is flowing and is passed over.

That is the aim of the new scheme. I will not say that it is perfect yet; it would be foolish to do so. However, it is worth keeping in mind the fact that as the new scheme starts working better it will ultimately ensure that money reaches children more quickly, which ought to dissipate people's understandable frustrations. We already intervene in what is often a fraught situation between two parties—they are not always warring parties, but it sometimes feels as if they are. That is a delicate position for staff in the agency, which is compounded by the problems that were always there with the old system and by the ongoing difficulties that we are having in making the new system work as well as it should.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that each week thousands of cases are cleared effectively on the new system. I am sorry that that has not happened for the first person he mentioned from his constituency, whose application was made in June 2003 and will therefore have been considered under the new system. I am disappointed to hear of that person's experience. I can say nothing further to the hon. Gentleman about that case, except that if he would like to give me more details outside the Chamber, I should be happy to look into it and try to find out what on earth is happening. From what he said, the situation does not seem to have been resolved yet. I would like to assist him in ensuring that it is resolved as soon as possible, and to pass on any information about what has gone wrong.

Until the end of June, almost 120,000 new scheme maintenance calculations had been made and about 46,000 non-resident parents had started to pay maintenance using the agency's collection service. About 25,000 parents with care had started to get the child maintenance premium income disregard in their benefit. That means that, for the first time, those parents with care will see the benefit of any maintenance paid, at a time when they most need it. If they move into work, they can retain that premium.

Because the new scheme is so much easier to understand, parents are more able to make their own arrangements without involving the agency, which, in a way, is the hidden benefit of the new scheme. Indeed, the interactive calculator on the agency's internet site had more than 25,000 visits in September this year. One assumes that those visits were probably by parents working out between themselves what the liability would be. Obviously, that has something to recommend it.

The new child support scheme is starting to make a real contribution to supporting children. However, there are still problems, as is well known. The hon. Gentleman quoted from the Select Committee report, which considered the issue closely, and hon. Members are well aware of the problems that we have had. I shall not pretend that my ministerial colleagues and I have not been disappointed with progress to deal with the problems so far, but we are going in the right direction. Progress is sometimes frustratingly slow, but we are moving forward. Clients and staff have told us that when the new scheme works, it works well, so there is something there that we can aim to improve.

People lead complex lives, and the scheme will not always seem fair to all parties who have to interact with it. That was true of the old system and it is true of the new one, but the job of agency staff is to assess the facts and properly apply the relevant law.

The second case that the hon. Gentleman raised—that of his constituent from Barnton—appears to involve an application made under the old system of child support. I am afraid that the parade of frustration that he related is indicative of a number of issues, primarily the difficulties that the old system caused for everybody. That case highlights the administrative problems of the old scheme, as well as the problem of having to deal with self-employed non-resident parents—a point that the hon. Gentleman particularly emphasised—which is acknowledged as a severe difficulty, particularly when those parents do not co-operate. Indeed, as he said, they sometimes do more than not co-operate: they deliberately try to frustrate the work of the agency. I do not understand why they would want to punish their children in that way, but many non-resident parents seem to want to do it.

We accept that there are particular concerns with self-employed non-resident parents. Theirs are often the most intractable cases in our postbags and surgeries, and make for some of the most difficult cases reported by the media. Recovery of money owed by self-employed people is notoriously difficult not only for the CSA but for a range of other agencies. Other revenue departments have similar difficulties in dealing with the self-employed. The situation is the same in other countries: the self-employed non-resident parent often presents the most intractable difficulty.

However, only about 6 per cent. of non-resident parents are self-employed. In old-scheme cases in 2003–04, compliance for the self-employed non-resident parent was about 67 per cent., compared with an overall figure of 74 per cent. There is a difference, but it is not enormous. Neither figure is good enough when it comes to compliance—both are still way too low. None the less, they demonstrate that many self-employed non-residents do co-operate. Members of Parliament, and my staff in the agency, obviously have to deal primarily with the ones who do not.

I shall say a little about what we are doing to try to increase our compliance work, because it is tremendously important. Achieving compliance is obviously an important part of the work of a large number of agency staff. I could not have said that before the new scheme was introduced, because most agency staff were occupied with trying to work out the calculations. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will know—he will have heard Ministers in my position say this before—that under the old scheme, up to 100 different pieces of information might have to be obtained before the calculation could even be made. That meant that about 90 per cent. of our staff's time was taken up trying to obtain the information, and almost none was spent chasing compliance, even when the calculation had been done. I am glad to say that the new scheme makes a great difference to that ratio, because compliance is much more important than doing the calculation if the aim, which the hon. Gentleman made clear he agrees with, is to get money to the children who need it.

At all stages of a case, staff are taking action to ensure that non-resident parents accept their responsibility and comply with the maintenance calculation. The new scheme calculation makes that easier because it is much more transparent. It might sometimes be seen to provide rough justice, but everyone can work it out: the calculation is pretty easy to do. Even before that stage, staff are encouraging non-resident parents to make voluntary payments to the parent with care while they wait for a calculation, so that they can get into the habit of paying and do not start off with arrears.

At times under the old system, by the time calculations were made the arrears seemed to be enormous and were often based on interim calculations that non-resident parents might have thought of as made in fantasyland. Moreover, parents often did not understand how the calculations had been made, which did not exactly promote compliance. The new scheme is a big step forward in that regard. We should, however, be realistic: some parents will always fail to pay, for whatever reason. The hon. Gentleman's second example perhaps made that point.

To deal with such cases, the agency is placing even greater emphasis on ensuring that money flows. Last year we launched a campaign called "Children Can't Wait", which aims to ensure that staff take prompt and effective action at the first sign that payments are not being made. Several options are available if non-resident parents refuse to make arrangements to pay, either directly to the parent with care or through the agency. The threat of a sanction will often, but not always, result in the payment of maintenance, but the agency does not shy away from taking action if the threat does not result in maintenance being paid. If non-resident parents are employed, maintenance can be deducted from their wages, although that is obviously more difficult in the case of the self-employed.

This is a specialist area of work, and since March 2004 the agency has increased the number of staff working in it.In the year to March 2004 there was a 24 per cent. increase on the previous year in the number of cases referred to bailiffs, so we are starting to take more effective action. In cases in which the non-resident parent persists in wilful non-compliance, the court can take away driving licences or commit people to prison. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that although only four driving licences have been removed by the court, 28 people who were in court with that threat hanging over them decided that payment was the best way to deal with the issue. People who, right up to the door of the court, do not intend to pay, can be made to do so by threats such as the removal of driving licences. The figures for committal to prison are even more interesting: 15 people have been committed as a result of non-payment, but some 234 have had suspended committal orders. That means that they decided that it was preferable to pay. Improvements are taking place.

The self-employed are a tougher nut to crack. We cannot attach their earnings because, as the hon. Gentleman made clear, it is difficult to work out what they are. However, they can receive liability orders. He might feel that the case that he raised has not been solved, but we are doing more to obtain money from self-employed non-resident parents who are not willing to pay. One has to apply to the courts for a liability order, and then the issue of what resources are available has to be proved. Such orders can deal only with arrears; they do not cover ongoing maintenance. Even if the non-resident parent pays once the order has been granted, he will not necessarily continue to do so. There can still be a problem of non-compliance afterwards if he is so inclined—perhaps it is unfair to say "he"; that is not necessarily the case, although it usually is.

John Barrett: I thank the Minister for what she has said about enforcement. Will she detail what action can be taken quickly with regard to the non-resident parent when it is obvious that his lifestyle—the person involved usually is a man—cannot be sustained on the relatively minimal income that has been declared? Can the CSA move quickly so that the arrears, once assessed, do not build up to amounts as substantial as those that have applied in cases that have come to me?

Maria Eagle: Obviously, the agency has to be able to verify that there is a problem with the income. As the hon. Gentleman says, that sometimes seems obvious to onlookers. We ask for evidence of the non-resident parent's income. It can be difficult to obtain, but we have powers to share information with other Government agencies that might have cause to hold it, which helps a great deal. The fact that we are willing to take court action quickly can also help with compliance. In addition, the fact that more of our staff now deal with compliance makes it likely that we will be able to act more quickly than in the case that the hon. Gentleman described—nobody would argue that that set a good example.

Having read what was said by the Select Committee, the hon. Gentleman asked a couple of questions about computer problems. He asked whether cases got stuck because of IT problems or other administrative problems. The difficulty is generally an IT problem. Part of the recovery programme led by our computer suppliers EDS, of which he will have heard, is designed to prevent cases from getting stuck, and there has been some progress. Improvements are made with each release of the new code and the fixes for the problems that have caused the sticking in the system.

The number of cases that are stuck has dropped from some 120,000 to about 40,000. That is progress. I accept that that does not help an individual whose case is stuck, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if we cannot fix the problem of a stuck case in an IT way, there are manual fixes that can get round that problem in particular cases. We deal with cases clerically to do that, but clearly that is not administratively efficient.

One of the instances to which the hon. Gentleman referred concerned the payment—

11.30 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Private Sector Pension Schemes

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed, let me tell hon. Members that I shall suspend the sitting for about 15 minutes should there be a Division in the House. Any time lost will be added on at the end of the debate. I call Mr. Webb.

2 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am glad that I have become so well known in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. Sometimes, with bifocals, you can end up looking in the wrong place because the lens is split.

Mr. Laws: I have the same problem.

I am pleased to secure the debate, and I welcome the Minister and other hon. Members to their places. It is traditional in my party to leave certain pension issues to my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), who speaks so effectively on them for us in the House. Therefore, I do not want to raise the wide policy issues that seem to have opened up in recent weeks. Instead, I want to focus on the pensions debate as it relates to those of my constituents who have been affected by the problems that have arisen in private sector pension schemes over the past couple of years.

Without wanting to tread too much on the toes of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who will speak in another debate later, I want to mention the experiences of 87 members of the Turner and Newall pension scheme at Daido Industrial Bearings Europe Ltd. in Ilminster, most of whom are constituents. I also want to talk about the 108 members of the Varta Ltd. pension scheme in Crewkerne, who have also encountered some problems that have affected private sector pension schemes in recent years.

I am sure that those cases are the tip of the iceberg and that other schemes in my constituency have been affected by a variety of problems. Indeed, I have had representations from 67 people who work at Doncasters in Chard and who are members of Allied Signal's reserved membership final salary pension scheme. However, I shall not focus on that issue today, because it is being dealt with through the courts; we hope that there will be a settlement. Instead, I shall focus on the first two cases.

Although I said that I wanted to leave many of the big-picture issues to my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon, it is clear that this is not just a constituency issue and that problems with private sector pension schemes have been experienced across the country over the past couple of years. Therefore, the Government not only face the challenge of achieving a fair settlement for individuals such as my constituents who have been affected by problems with their pensions. They also have a strong public policy interest in reinforcing the credibility of the private pensions industry and their own pension provision. If they do not do so, I fear that the worrying trend that we have seen over the past couple of years may develop further, with an increasingly widespread perception among members of the public that pensions are not a good investment, that they are not safe and that people should put their money into the housing market instead.

A cursory review of the personal finance sections of newspapers is enough to show that the view that private pensions are no longer safe, reliable or a sound investment is not limited to the many individuals who already have difficulty finding the money to save. Such views go far wider and include groups that traditionally have regarded pensions as a safe and sound investment but that, after their experiences with pensions over the past three or four years and with property prices over the past decade or so, are shifting their asset portfolio in a way that could turn out to be extremely dangerous in years to come if there is a significant downturn in the housing market, and particularly if everyone in the current generation saves through the housing market and ends up having to sell at the same time to fund their retirement.

The reasons for the recent problems with private sector pension provision are well known, and several have impacted directly on my constituents in the T and N and Varta schemes. Briefly, they include the introduction of controls on pension fund surpluses from 1987, which encouraged employers to take contribution holidays. That issue is of particular relevance to my constituents in the T and N pension fund. Also, of course, the abolition of tax credits paid to pension funds, in the Chancellor's first Budget, has had an adverse impact on many private schemes. The introduction, from June 2001, of the new accounting standard, FRS 17, had a further impact. Obviously, the fall of the stock market since 2001 has had a major effect on the valuation of many private sector pension schemes.

One could add further factors to that list of major elements affecting private sector pension provision, not least of which perhaps is the fact that longevity is increasing. The consequences of that must be dealt with not only in the private sector but, increasingly, in the public sector.

For those reasons, there have been significant problems in many private sector pension schemes—the beginning of the end for many defined benefit schemes. The Government have responded to that—in some cases, under quite a lot of pressure from other parties in the House—by introducing their pension protection fund, starting in April 2005, and the financial assistance scheme, which, on my understanding, will be backward-looking from May 2004.

We accept that the Government have taken two desirable steps to help many of the people who are affected by the problems with private sector pension schemes. We also accept that there are many difficulties in framing the schemes in ways that will not create incentives for private sector employers to dump their pension liabilities on the public sector. Whichever party was in government would have to be conscious of the issues and concerns that the Minister described, in the recent Conservative Opposition-day debate on pensions, as the problem of moral hazard. It is understandable also that those constituents of ours who find that they are at risk of losing all, or almost all, their pension are not interested in esoteric arguments about moral hazard, but want to know what action will be taken to assist them.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments closely. Does he agree that the individuals concerned cannot for the life of them see a rational distinction between those who are caught up in a solvent wind-up of a pension fund and those caught up in an insolvent wind-up? From their point of view, they are equally unable to control events. Does he think, as I do, that they should be treated the same?

Mr. Laws: That is a real issue. I agree that the individuals concerned may not see the distinction that the Government and others want to draw. I believe that it is important, however, that the Government frame legislation in a way that does not open opportunities for the private sector to shift its liabilities to the public sector.

The two pension schemes that I want to talk about are both affected by another problem in the Government's proposals: the well known problem of the gap between the two Government schemes. Some people will be protected in part by the financial assistance scheme, up to May 2004, and others may get protection beyond April 2005 through the pension protection fund.

I bring to the attention of hon. Members today two cases involving the problem of pension schemes—and affected constituents—that fall into the gap in between. The wind-ups of the schemes in question are starting in the period between the operation of the financial assistance scheme and that of the pension protection fund. I want to press the Minister on what progress is being made on whether Government compensation will extend to people who fall into the gap. There is a strong sense among those of my constituents who are affected, but also in the mind of the average man in the street who is interested in such issues, that it would be ridiculous for one cohort of people to be trapped and, because of what happens in one year of the Labour Government's term of office, excluded from compensation. That is what would happen to the 87 members of the T and N pension scheme at Daido Industrial Bearings Europe Ltd.

In the past couple of days and in today's press, there has been hopeful news about the T and N pension fund. It seems that the unions and others have done a good job in trying to negotiate a better deal from those who are seeking to buy the company out of chapter 11 bankruptcy. Let us hope that the private sector will find a solution to the T and N problem, rather than the obligations for 40,000 individuals in the UK being transferred to the Government and the taxpayer.

I understand why the Minister has been reticent in respect of giving an undertaking on what will happen if there is no private sector solution to the T and N pension fund problems. Understandably, he does not want to encourage anything that would transfer those liabilities to the public sector, but I seek at least some encouragement that he understands the position of the people who may fall in the gap between the Government's two schemes and that he is considering their situation sympathetically. I would also be grateful if he gave us more information about the timetable that he envisages for making decisions on how such people will be affected.

I note that the Government have already made some comments on the record in the past month, indicating that they are looking at people who fall between the schemes sympathetically. Baroness Hollis of Heigham said:

> "We have not yet ruled out help in respect of schemes that start to wind up between May 2004 and the introduction of the PPF—what I call the sandwich year."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 September 2004; Vol. 664, c. GC132.]

I raised with the Minister the issue of my constituents at Daido Industrial Bearings Europe Ltd. who are affected by the T and N pension scheme. He replied in a letter dated 20 September that

> "the details of the Financial Assistance Scheme have yet to be finalised and we have not yet ruled out help in respect of schemes which start to wind up between May this year and the introduction of the Pension Protection Fund. We will take final decisions on requirements for the Financial Assistance Scheme once further research and consultation has been concluded."

Today, I want him to give not a cast-iron guarantee—I know he will not do that—but something a little more positive than "not yet ruled out" that shows that he understands that people caught in the gap between the schemes deserve proper protection from the Government. I would also like him to indicate how the research and consultation are proceeding and when we can expect a decision. I am sure that he understands that those who may be affected and who stand to lose a large amount of their provision for retirement are extremely worried about this issue and seek some guidance from the Government about how they intend to pursue it.

My constituents who are in the T and N pension fund understand that, beyond those two important points, there is a limit to the extent to which the Government can comment on the private negotiations taking place. However, when I contacted them about the debate, they asked me to raise several other issues with the Minister regarding their frustrations about how the problems in the T and N pension scheme arose. I hope that the Minister will give his views on those issues. First, in their minds, the main reason that the fund ran into problems was the long pension holiday that it had—I believe that it was almost a decade. We understand why, in the 1980s, the Government decided that a restriction to avoid losing taxation was needed, but, with the large swings in financial markets, surely we want to ensure that we do not deter any companies or pension funds that want to run up reasonable surpluses as a cushion against the bad times.

The second point raised by my constituents at Daido was whether there should be a stronger obligation on the trustees of some pension funds to have an actuarial evaluation more regularly than every three years and to give clearer information to scheme members, so that they can understand some risks that are developing and how well funded their pension scheme is. I suspect that, for many individuals in this position, the problems that they end up with and the near collapse of their scheme often come as a complete surprise. They will not have appreciated some problems as they built up—sometimes over the short term, but usually over a couple of years.

The third issue that constituents raised was whether there should be some special secure status for pension fund assets in the break-up of companies going into liquidation. One can obviously anticipate some problems that might arise, but it is a legitimate issue to raise with the Government and I hope that the Minister touches on it.

The fourth and final point that the constituents raised, which is becoming increasingly relevant in the world of international ownership for private sector employers, was how the Government intend to protect UK workers in foreign-owned companies from the application of foreign pension laws. I will return to the situation faced by T and N members at Daido. Essentially, we have a Japanese firm, decisions that are made in America about a US-based pension fund and an English firm. The way in which we co-operate with other countries to agree a common set of rules, regulations and procedures in relation to pension law could be important in such cases.

I suspect that the Minister will not be as familiar with the second case as he is with the major issue of the T and N fund. It affects a large number of people in my constituency, and a much smaller number across the UK. It is the position of the 108 employees in the Varta Ltd. pension and life assurance scheme who were employed by Varta Ltd., a battery company in Crewkerne in my constituency. After the debate, I will send the Minister additional details about that particular case, so that he can respond. However, I would like briefly to raise the Varta case, not least because I suspect that it demonstrates some problems that the Government are grappling with and some that will need to be grappled with, and some measures that businesses are taking to try to reduce the pension liabilities that would otherwise fall to them.

The Varta Ltd. pension and life assurance scheme was established as a final salary scheme in 1971, and was historically funded by contributions from both the company and employees. Varta Ltd. was a subsidiary of Varta AG, a German company, and Varta AG was in turn sold to DB Investor, a company substantially owned by Deutsche Bank, in 2000. There was a further change in October 2002, when Varta AG sold a retail supply business to a US company, Rayovac Corporation. At that time, the Varta Ltd. business had to be split to separate the two bits: the part that was being purchased by the US entity and the part that was not.

It was no secret prior to the Rayovac purchase that the pension scheme, like many others, was in deficit on the basis of the minimum funding requirement and US and UK accounting standards. The deficit was about £2 million. Following the purchase of Varta Ltd. by Rayovac, the decision was made to close the Varta Ltd. site at Crewkerne and to transfer the business to the existing Rayovac operations in the United Kingdom. That took effect from 31 May 2003, at which time the employees and directors left the company.

Rayovac has met its statutory debt obligation to the scheme, as required by law, and Varta Ltd., although still nominally the principal employer, is likely to be wound up. However, Rayovac has so far proved unwilling to discuss who will negotiate any further assistance to the scheme's 108 members.

Varta Microbattery Ltd. continued to pay into the scheme after 31 May 2003, up to 31 December when its Inland Revenue approval expired. Consequently, as the last employer, the company became liable to make up any shortfall, which by that time had to be measured on a fully bought-out basis, as there were no contributing members left. When Varta Microbattery realised that that amount was £4 million in total, which the company could not afford to pay, it used the legal loophole left last year by placing the company into administration in February 2004, making all its employees redundant. The business was then immediately re-opened as a branch office of Varta Microbattery GmbH, and the company re-engaged those employees it wished to retain. By that process, it is likely to avoid its responsibility to the members of the Varta Ltd. pension scheme, unless the trustees of the scheme succeed in claiming from the German parent company. In August 2004, Varta Ltd. triggered the winding-up of the scheme, with the consequence that deferred members can now expect only about 45 per cent. of the pension that they earned.

That presents the Minister with several different issues to address, as the Government will no doubt be concerned to ensure that the pension protection legislation is very carefully put together. I do not necessarily expect him to have grasped all the details in this short debate, so I hope that, by writing separately to him, he can guide us as to whether any measures could be taken to pursue some of those obligations.

Obviously, what concerns constituents of mine who are affected by this situation is that, although they have heard about the Government's widely trumpeted scheme to offer compensation to people who have lost out in private sector schemes such as these, they now find that they fall between the pension protection fund and the Government's compensation scheme up to May 2004. This is yet another case that shows that a large number of deserving individuals fall between the two Government schemes. I hope that the Government will think again about whether they can deal with the needs of those individuals, which would not happen under the proposed schemes.

The desperation and frustration felt by many of these people, who have not always been properly informed about problems with their pension schemes and whose parent companies, with responsibility for their pension scheme, are often international, are summed up at the end of a note sent to me by a constituent, Mr Bailey, who is still employed at Daido Industrial Bearings Europe Ltd. in Ilminster and is a member of the T and N pension fund:

> "Here at Ilminster we find ourselves to be a Japanese owned Company sited in England. Our pension is based in England but appears to be effectively controlled from America. We have employees who have been with the Company for anything up to forty years. Some, myself included, are within a few years of retirement. We were encouraged by all and sundry to join the Company scheme which was promoted as the way to a financially secure retirement. Through no fault of our own- we now find ourselves in a situation where, at best, a significant percentage of our pensions may well be lost. All this to support an ailing American Company that we no longer work for!"

That is a good example of the frustration felt by people today.

We accept that many of these problems date back even further than the period of office of the Labour Government and that there are challenges for all parties.

We also accept that the problems in those two pension schemes cannot simply be put down to one or two of the Government's decisions. The ultimate solution to many problems will involve a change in the whole architecture of pensions policy. We hope that the indications from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in the past few weeks are that the Government may be rethinking their existing complex pension scheme, which relies too much on means-tested benefits. While the Government are doing that long-term thinking, we hope that the Minister will offer more reassurance to individuals such as my constituents who are facing great losses in income in retirement. We hope that we can work with him over the next few months to give real comfort to people in that situation.

2.23 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I arrived at the debate with no intention other than to intervene on the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws). I want to say a few things, however, particularly about the administration process to which he referred, which will not surprise my hon. Friend the Minister.

I thank the Minister for receiving a delegation from Amicus, the Transport and General Workers Union and the work force of Lister-Petter, a couple of whose members graphically described the problems that they face. I share Lister-Petter with the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb): some of his constituents are part of the same pension fund as my constituents. The only thing that has changed since I last saw them is that the outcome of the administration is known. Members of the pension fund will receive less than a penny in the pound. With the best will in the world, that outcome was the biggest kick in the teeth that one could imagine. The Minister will remember that one of the gentlemen worked for Lister-Petter for 37 or 38 years, yet the workers stand to get next to nothing from the administration process.

I pay due regard to the Minister's previous boss, my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). He, too, saw me and took up some issues with the Department of Trade and Industry.

The Minister knows the arguments, and he knows what I shall be asking him to do. I know that he will reflect on what I say, but I accept that it will not be easy. The Lister-Petters of this world are prime examples of what can go wrong when companies get into difficulties and pension funds are sacrificed as a result. I know that he can say nothing about who will be included in the pension protection fund, but, if the Lister-Petter work force are not part of it, I do not know who will be. It is important to recognise that the state has a role as lender of last resort, but it should not be quite like that. Perhaps lessons can be learned and ideas taken forward to prevent a recurrence of such cases.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has been diligent in pursuing the interests of Lister-Petter pensioners. Does he share my concern that the Government have asked such schemes for information to help to construct the financial assistance scheme but have offered no help to meet the costs of supplying that information, and that the trustees can meet those costs from the pension fund, which will leave the workers with even less? Does he think that the Government should have met the cost of obtaining that information?

Mr. Drew: The state should certainly have a role in arbitrating on how the process of administration or receivership is taken forward. I was about to say that secured creditors should not have it as easy as they seem to, and that unsecured creditors should not be sacrificed. However, when push comes to shove, often the reality is that little is left—except, dare I say it, for the Exchequer. The state may have to take on such responsibilities. It is wrong to expect the workers to carry the entire burden. It is completely unfair.

I have used Lister-Petter as a case history, but it is a good example as it demonstrates what we need to learn from such a wrong set of circumstances. From the outset, however, my investigation of the Lister-Petter pension fund showed no evidence of maladministration. The company was unfortunate in as much as there was a stock market blip at exactly the wrong moment, and the problems that the company faced were mirrored by those that faced the pension fund. Although the pension fund needed outside support, the company should have been doing more. However, the state should have a role to play in trying at least to get a fairer settlement.

The main problem when it comes to the process of administration, let alone a full winding-up, is that the power that we invest in the administrator or receiver is so great that the pension fund is left at the bottom of the pile. The way in which the assets are settled leaves the pension fund as the most unsecured of creditors. It is bound to lose. As far as I can make out—I will be careful in how I word this—it pays the administrator very little to be fair to the pension fund, whereas for the banks and other prime creditors the administrator is, for all sorts of reasons, seen to be unduly helpful.

We face a closed circle. I have raised the issue on a number of occasions. I know that it is not the Minister's responsibility, but I will continue to bang on about it. The Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Trade and Industry must between them tackle the secret garden of the administration process and, dare I say it, receivership. The process needs to be opened out. Too often, the pension fund loses out because it is unclear what decisions are taken on behalf of whom, except that in a number of cases we can see who loses out.

In the case of Lister-Petter, the pension fund was already in difficulties when, roughly a year ago, the company began to experience serious difficulties itself. The hon. Member for Northavon talked about the issue. I have had a lot to do with the case, but I do not want to labour the point about how much of my time the issue has taken up. More important are the repercussions in a company town such as Dursley, which was based around Lister-Petter.

At its height, the pension fund was about £12 million in the red. By the time of the closure, that figure was reduced to less than £10 million and was moving in the right direction. Again, there is a question about the administrator and, dare I say it, the independent trustee appointed by the administrator to consider the grounds on which a decision to close the pension fund might be taken. I accept that such legal and financial decisions must be taken, and one trusts that they are taken for all the best reasons. In the case in question, there was no real alternative in the view of the trustees of the pension fund.

The killer is that, when a pension fund is, say, £9 million in the red, the real cost of trying to keep it going is about three times that, because the money in the red must be annuitised. Again, the issue relates to the confidence of the market and what it expects. In due course, as the stock market improved, the pension could have come back. Why does that matter?

Mr. Webb: Of course, there is an alternative to annuitisation, which is for the financial assistance scheme to take over the assets—it does not have to cash them in and therefore buy a poor-value annuity. I do not know whether the Government have ruled that option out, but does the hon. Gentleman share my view that that should happen? The FAS should take over the assets, not force people to buy poor-value annuities.

Mr. Drew: I do not disagree at all. My point is that, when you look for a potential suitor—it is the role of the administrator to try to keep a company as a going concern—the pension fund is seen as a great dead weight. If an administrator can lose the pension fund, that is seen as something that makes the company more attractive. The administrator's motivation is therefore completely at odds with the continuation of the pension fund. The hon. Gentleman proposes a way to overcome that, which is something that the Minister might want to talk about. The danger is that you could end up with the state picking up a rather hefty bill, but something has to be done.

The reason the issue is so important is that it concerns the prioritisation of the security of the assets when a company experiences difficulties.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I warn the hon. Gentleman that when he says "you" he means me? Normally, I am quite relaxed about that, but, as a former chairman of a pension fund, it could be embarrassing.

Mr. Drew: I apologise. I shall try to talk in the plural. In the situation that I described, everything is stacked against the pension fund that has to try to survive. As I have said—we accept that it is not the responsibility of the Minister—part of the solution is to persuade the DTI. I am looking for more of a level playing field, so that the pension fund is not seen to be the makeweight of any administration process. The people whom one would want to protect are those who are most unprotected. The sad thing in the case of Lister-Petter is that the people who have had the boot put in are those who stayed with the company through thick and thin and who may have foregone their pension because they preferred to stay as deferred pensioners. They have lost out completely.

2.36 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.50 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Drew: I shall conclude promptly. I know that the Minister will argue against the case that I have advanced—this time in public—that there is a danger that companies will take this as an opportunity to get rid of their company schemes and that those who could be in the game of taking them over would have every reason to object if they believed that such a move would leave them responsible for a punitive pensions fund.

In these days of corporate social responsibility, there is no clearer way for a decent business to behave than to recognise that its pension fund is a critical measure not only of how effectively it does business, but of how it cares for its work force. At a time when the quality of a business is determined by the quality of its work force, we should pay far greater attention to fairness in pension funds. I hope that the Minister will give us good news. If nothing else, he should take our concerns back to the DTI and nail down the gross unfairness that we are debating.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on having secured the debate. He approached the issue in his typically forensic, measured and analytical way. I also congratulate him on the timing of the debate—although, as the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) said, if one misses one pensions debate these days, there will always be another over the next week.

We have focused of late on the long-term pensions crisis, in the wake of the Turner review, so it is timely that this debate concerns not the ticking pensions time bomb but the crisis that is already with us. There have been some developments in recent months. The unions are suing the Government; the Lords are in Committee considering the Pensions Bill in a state of some confusion about the Government's proposals; the parliamentary ombudsman might be about to launch an inquiry, following complaints by 47 Members of Parliament—including, I am led to believe, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions—and there is even a criminal investigation by South Wales police. We cannot wait for all those inquiries to reach their conclusions. As we have heard from the hon. Members for Yeovil and for Stroud (Mr. Drew), the problem is ongoing for people in many constituencies. I shall accede to the Minister's request to keep my comments brief if he will agree to answer my questions, by return of post if not during the debate.

There is a link between the long-term debate and the short-term crisis, and that is the issue of trust, as the hon. Member for Yeovil said. Public confidence in the pensions system has collapsed, largely because of the myriad crises in occupational pension funds. In addressing the crisis, the Government have an opportunity to restore that confidence. I remember the debate in May when the Government announced the financial assistance scheme, to a chorus of halleluiahs from all over the House. Unfortunately, some of that good will, and the trust that was beginning to be restored by their acceptance of responsibility, has been frittered away by the Government in the subsequent months. Presumably, that is why the union has taken the action that it has, and why MPs have made an application to the ombudsman.

One of the critical worries is the adequacy of the funds. Many independent commentators have come to the conclusion that there is not enough money to make adequate provision for those whose pensions have been stolen. Any figure that one cites is dwarfed by the £5 million that the Chancellor still receives every year as a result of having removed the tax credit that pensions received on company dividends. Surely the Government can do more than they are doing.

As the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) said, in the context of the complaints and the concerns that have been raised about administrative fees, it is absurd that the Government are asking pension schemes—which are suffering gaping holes in their provision and cannot pay some of their deferred pensioners—to pick up the tab for filling in the Government's 11-page questionnaire. All that the Government have done is ask the administrators to keep charges to a minimum. No control has been put on that. The members of the schemes, who are the innocent parties, have to suffer for something that is the Government's responsibility. The Government decided to bring in the financial assistance scheme; surely they can see fit not to fritter away further the funds in the schemes. Some have already lost 10 or 15 per cent. of their available funds in fees. Surely the Government can do better than that.

The question of who will be covered has been raised. There is a lot of uncertainty. All that the Government tell us is that some people will be helped, somewhat, at some time. That is all we can say with any certainty. Surely we need to give some response to companies. People who belonged to schemes before April 1997—10 per cent. of those identified in the Government's paper, which I think was released in June—would not be covered. I cannot see any moral, legal or other argument for excluding those people, who are in exactly the same situation as the others.

The Government risk creating a new injustice and a new set of people who feel that they have been wronged first by their companies, then by successive Governments who—unlike almost every other Government in the world—did not put measures in place to protect them, and now by a financial assistance scheme that arbitrarily excludes them. The same applies to the so-called sandwich year of the company insolvency scheme for the 300 workers of the German paper company, Felix Schoeller. That company has turned its back on a £12.5 million pension fund deficit, although its parent company made a reported profit of over £100 million in the last year. How can the members of that scheme, who have done no wrong, be excluded?

The company is to blame, and yes, the Government should be going after the company, but surely provision should be made for the members, and for those at Turner and Newall in Wales, and at the former Ferodo plant in Caernarfon, now Dynamex Friction. The workers there fought the longest-running industrial dispute in British history and now face the prospect, on top of that, of losing up to 70 per cent. of their pension fund. Surely the Government have to provide some support for those workers.

I would like the Minister to tell us whether there have been any changes to the timetable that he outlined in May, now that further work has to be done on the numbers until 12 November. Will that have any impact on the timetable? Will we still see the first payments in the spring? When will we get the affirmative procedure vote on the detailed regulations that we were promised, and will there be a debate as well as a vote?

I agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), whose idea of using unclaimed assets was taken up by the Opposition. I do not care where the money comes from so long as we find some for the people who, as the Minister acknowledges, believe that their pensions were stolen. Perhaps it is not such a bad idea that the South Wales police have launched an investigation. That money belonged to the scheme members.

The Government pride themselves on evidence-based policy making, but they announced an arbitrary figure before the work was done on eligible numbers. That does not make sense. They must revisit their cost assessment so that we can provide real security for all those who are deserving and who have lost out, and whom successive Governments have failed. The Government have an opportunity to restore confidence I hope they do not miss it.

3 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) not merely on securing this debate—that seems an odd custom—but on his wise choice to speak on behalf of his constituents who have lost some of or all their occupational pension rights. I have struggled to come up with the right analogy, but the situation is rather like looking at a window pane in the winter when it starts to snow. Initially there is one flake of snow on the pane and then another until, suddenly, it is snowing heavily and the entire pane is covered. It is rather like that for hon. Members who become concerned about occupational pension schemes.

Most try not to know anything about such schemes, but we have all been dragged kicking and screaming into that arena, because in more and more constituencies more and more hon. Members who, for understandable reasons, have never looked into such matters are drawn in because constituents have lost their pensions. While listening to departmental questions we have the macabre sport of spotting new MPs raising for the first time issues that have been raised month after month as the problem continues to spread. My hon. Friend spoke up powerfully for his constituents who worked for Turner and Newall and Varta—I am sure that I have bought its batteries in the past, but am not sure that I would have done if I had known what it has done. My hon. Friend raised some important issues, and I hope that the Minister will respond fully.

I shall touch on the four key points that my hon. Friend raised. He asked about pension contribution holidays. That may sound like a quaint throwback to some bygone era, but it would be interesting to know whether the Government have any plans to deal with pension fund surpluses if they re-emerge—whether they remain of the view that surpluses should be capped or whether there are plans for funds to build up healthy surpluses again, if the opportunity arises, to cushion funds against bad years and prevent a return to the rollercoaster.

My hon. Friend referred to the role of trustees and asked whether, in his local case, they had kept the workers properly informed and whether there should have been more frequent valuations. We touched on those issues when discussing the Pensions Bill. The Government have put a new onus on trustees to understand pensions—that is a novelty—but I am not wholly convinced that they have put any onus on the trustees to ensure that scheme members are better informed. I hope that the Minister will respond on that point.

My hon. Friend also talked about the priority order of creditors when a company goes into receivership; the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) properly raised that important issue also. If the pension fund is at the bottom of the pile, many individuals lose out badly. One could understand why the banks, if they were at the bottom of the pile, might turn round and say that that increased their risk so they must charge more interest whenever they lend money to a company. Balances must be struck. I remember the priority order of creditors being raised in one of the endless stream of Green Papers that we have seen. Perhaps the Minister will clarify whether the Government have rejected making any changes on that front.

My hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil raised that most intractable set of issues raised by the question of what happens, in this increasingly global market, when a company that takes over another company is not based in the UK. It may be split off and there are liabilities hanging around from companies that no longer exist and so on. I hope that the Minister will do more than simply say that the matter is complicated. Can he offer us an assurance that any of our constituents who work for companies that are taken over by a foreign-owned parent company will enjoy the same pension rights protection that UK employees otherwise enjoy? Do British workers need to worry about their occupational pension rights if their company is taken over by an overseas employer? What will the impact be on their pension rights?

I shall touch briefly on the financial assistance scheme and some detailed points that were made. We heard from my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Stroud about the sandwich year. The Minister's response to an intervention on the subject last week was that he could not really say what would happen; he was worried about moral hazard.

Will the Minister clarify what he meant? Is he worried that firms considering going into receivership might hasten to do so, knowing that the pension fund liability would be, to some extent, picked up? Does he think that that might be going on at the moment? Moral hazard has many dimensions. I wonder what bar there is on the Minister giving my hon. Friend's constituents—as well as people from Lister-Petter and other companies—some reassurance.

We have had almost no information about how the financial assistance scheme will be run. The logic is that the financial assistance scheme would take over the assets of Lister-Petter, or whoever was involved, rather than converting them into poor-value annuities. Is that what will happen? Will the financial assistance scheme have assets acquired from the firms that have been wound up, topped up by the taxpayer? Who will run that? Will there be a new financial assistance board, or a quango or something similar? Surely the logical approach would be for the shadow pension protection fund to run it. It performs an almost identical function.

It has been suggested to me, rather cynically—obviously I reject the analysis—that the Government have not said that the pension protection fund will run the financial assistance scheme because that might lead people to think that there was a connection between the two. I do not accept that cynical approach; I know the Minister to be a man of principle. I hope that he will reassure me that the taxpayers' interests, and those of scheme members, will be best served by the PPF running the FAS.

Why will the FAS run for only 20 years? If I am 55 now, presumably I can expect to live another 25 or 30 years. What will happen when the money runs out? Why did the Government think that 20 lots of £20 million was the right number? As the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) said, the Government are only now doing the research and asking the questions—but they have already worked out the answer. Where is the evidence that the figure is adequate? We all know that it is not, and that the Government started with the answer and worked back to the question.

It was interesting to watch the Minister's facial expressions when the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr was asking why the Government do not bear the cost of obtaining the information. If I read those expressions correctly, a paraphrase of what he was saying from a sedentary position without moving his lips was, "What do you want? The Government are already putting in £20 million and the members are benefiting from it, so they can lump it." I do not accept that analysis.

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): My experience of Hansard is that, although it is excellent in many ways, it is not good at facial expressions or irony.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman resumes his seat, I assure hon. Members that the transcription of the debate is not even happening in this building, let alone taking account of facial expressions.

Mr. Webb: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It has been suggested that it is regrettable that the written English language lacks a type-face known as ironic bold, which might have been appropriate just now.

The serious point is that the schemes in question, which already do not have enough money in them, have to bear a burden. The Minister gave a written answer on Thursday to a question from me about how many letters had been sent out—he could not tell me—and about the burden of the cost of supplying the information. He said that it would depend on "the extent to which those involved in administering the schemes are able to absorb any costs incurred".

Why should they? They are profit-making organisations. Have the Government rung them up and said, "Oh go on, don't charge us for this"? What incentive do they have for not passing on the costs? Allied Steel and Wire was the classic case in which scheme administrators and independent trustees were charging £100 to answer a phone call.

Adam Price: Is not part of the problem the fact that there is no guarantee, once the cost has been borne, that the scheme will benefit? The letter that has been sent says:

"Neither the provision of the information, nor any subsequent contact from the DWP, is to be taken as an indication that a scheme or its members will be entitled to assistance"

The scheme bears the cost of providing the Government with the data, but there is no guarantee of any benefit.

Mr. Webb: It would be particularly harsh to supply the information, thereby taking money out of the fund, and then find that the scheme was not covered in the first place.

In the written answer, the Minister continued:

"The Government is still seeking"— desperately seeking, one senses—

"industry contributions to the Financial Assistance Scheme and this is an opportunity for members . . . to provide one."

Well, we will see, will we not? The written answer ends:

"We encouraged those involved to keep costs to a minimum."—[Official Report, 14 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 343W.]

Nudges, winks and encouragement. The cost to an individual scheme could be significant; the cost to the Government is negligible. Given that those workers—those scheme members—have suffered enough already, could the Government not have said, "We will meet the costs of the extra information-gathering exercise"? As the hon. Gentleman said, that exercise should feed into the scale of the financial assistance scheme, not the other way round.

We could talk all day about those issues, but I hope that we receive some concrete answers from the Minister, first to the specific questions about pension scheme management that my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil quite properly raised, and secondly, about how and under whose auspices the financial assistance scheme will be run. There is no moral hazard in providing answers to those questions, and I hope that the Minister will do so as comprehensively as he can.

3.11 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I will not take up the snowflake analogy of the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), although the Government are doing what the Americans call a "snow job" on pensioners and would-be pensioners.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing the debate. As the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) pointed out, this is not exactly a rare opportunity to debate problems in pensions, but it is nice to have a period of calm reflection in Westminster Hall after the frenetic activity last week, with a full day's debate, departmental questions and the Turner report to keep us busy.

It is worth stepping back from the frenetic discussions that we have weekly and sometimes two or three times a week about the purpose of Government policy. In a sentence, it should be to reinvest pensions with the confidence of different groups of the British public. People saving for their retirement in company schemes want some reassurance, which I guess is supposed to be the role of the pension protection fund. There is also the vast raft of young people who are simply not interested in pensions, whom the hon. Member for Yeovil touched on. They are turned off by the whole idea of pensions and must be encouraged to take an interest again.

The other part to reinvesting pensions with public confidence is to demonstrate to those groups that we are treating as fairly as possible those people who have already got into difficulties through no fault of their own—the people at Turner and Newall in Ilminster and the constituents of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). I add my warm welcome to the news that the Turner and Newall problem is apparently on its way to being solved, but I am sure that there are still some loose ends to tie up. I recently met a delegation from Derbyshire, where there is a high concentration of Turner and Newall employees, and they were extremely concerned about the future. However, it seems—fingers crossed—that a solution might have been found, so that the scheme can continue on a properly funded basis. That is excellent news.

That brings us to what Baroness Hollis of Heigham has called the sandwich year, or, as it has been called more accurately, the gap year in help for people who have lost all or a large part of their pension rights. The financial assistance scheme was met with a chorus of welcome and approval from many quarters. We were sceptical and have become more sceptical, but many groups that have worked and lobbied hard were on the face of it pleased with the announcement. As more detail has oozed—the only word that covers my point—out about the likely parameters of and exclusions from the scheme, that enthusiasm has rapidly evaporated.

The hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr said that the £400 million figure was arbitrary. I do not believe that anyone could argue with that. I have yet to hear Ministers even try to explain where the figure came from, but one thing that everyone seems to agree about is that it is not nearly enough to deal with the potential problems, let alone the additional problems that may arise between now and the PPF's coming into effect, subject to an issue that I shall deal with in a moment.

It is alarming that successive attempts by many right hon. and hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Northavon and me, to extract more detail from Ministers have met with almost complete stonewalling. As has been explained, the main reason put forward for not vouchsafing the details is moral hazard. Perhaps one can understand that. The Turner and Newall situation was vast, potentially affecting some 40,000 people and involving a shortfall—at least on paper—of nearly £900 million. That in itself was a reason for Ministers to be cautious. It is certainly the reason that Ministers have clung to in the recent past, but let us hope and expect that the good news is indeed good news, that Turner and Newall's problems will be manageable and that that particular problem will disappear from Ministers' desks—in which case, what other good reason is there for not giving us the details?

As I pointed out in the debate last week, it is now five months since the FAS was announced—in a bit of a flurry, I must say. I asked the Minister a series of questions. Sadly, he seemed unable to answer them then, so I shall repeat them now. I intend to keep repeating them in the hope that eventually he might give me the answers or even come up with the immortal words, "I will write to the hon. Member."

When does the Minister expect the first payment to be made? My suspicion is that it will be after spring next year, which is a date that may have some significance. Will victims of solvent wind-ups be included? Apparently, the answer is no. What is to happen about the Baroness's sandwich year? Is it really the case that a decision has been made that any wind-ups that start between May this year and April next year will not come within the FAS and, by definition, within the PPF? Will the payments be means-tested? Will they be taxed? Can the Minister report any progress in extracting voluntary contributions from industry, or the industry? Will he reconsider a bit more seriously our proposal to top up the £400 million—inevitably, it will have to be topped up—by using unclaimed assets?

It is clear that there could be a very large gap. In trying to recreate confidence in pensions, it is no good at all if Ministers are not prepared to be totally frank about such matters, particularly if a specific reason for not being so appears to have been removed from the scene.

Although the action of the steel union caused some procedural difficulties with the ombudsman's inquiry, it was not wholly unexpected. Apparently, the union looked closely at the FAS and what was on offer and was distinctly unimpressed. Some 200 cases have been referred by hon. Members to the ombudsman. I very much hope for and would urge an early decision by the ombudsman to make it clear that there will be an investigation of maladministration.

Let me touch briefly on one other issue. Again, it relates to confidence. It looks to the Pensions Bill, which this House will have the pleasure of receiving back from the other place probably just before we finish this Session, and the nature of the guarantee. I have made this point before, but it bears repeating. Hon. Members and Ministers must not oversell what is being offered in that Bill. The US model on which it is based, the Pensions Benefit Guaranty Corporation, gives a total guarantee that someone whose pension fund goes pear-shaped will get the amount to which they would have been entitled. However, we know from the detail in the Bill that that is not what is on offer in this country: the fund does not have Government backing; there is a cap on individual payments; there is only 90 per cent. for those who are still working when the problem arises; the Government are changing the rules on indexation; and, of course, as has not been lost on the newly appointed chairman of the PPF, there is a clear power to cut benefits if the funds are not available. In the interests of confidence, it is important either that some such things are changed—who knows what may happen in the debates in the House of Lords—or that we are open and honest with people about the fact that the scheme is not a guarantee and is not a complete lifeboat.

I return to the points made by the hon. Member for Yeovil. If any kind of confidence in the pension system is to be rebuilt, it is desperately important that we start to get clear details about the FAS, such as how it will be administered and by whom; how the payment of claims will be approached; how many pence in the pound people are likely to get; and when payments will start to come through. We also need answers to the other questions that I have raised again today. I promise the Minister that I will keep raising those questions until we get some answers.

3.21 pm

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) introduced the debate in a measured and analytical way, and I thank him for setting the tone. I also enjoyed the challenges in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), and the contribution of the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price). As ever, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) made a valuable contribution. Among Liberal Democrat pension snowflakes, he is primus inter pares. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) also made a challenging contribution.

I think we are all agreed that a crucial challenge for the Government, and Parliament, is to restore confidence and security in the pension system. Certain factors are largely out of our control, an obvious example being the huge decline in world share prices. Whenever it seems legitimate for the Government to intervene to introduce, or reintroduce, security and confidence, we must debate how to do so.

Although it is tempting to do so, this is not the occasion on which to re-debate the whole Pensions Bill. We have had opportunities to do that, and we will have further opportunities to do so, but I will try to touch on the more urgent issues that have been raised.

We have all met workers who have been adversely affected by the collapse of their companies and the terrible realisation that their pension dreams seem to have been shattered. Although I resist the vogue to call every issue and challenge a crisis, there is a real crisis for those groups of workers, which needs to be addressed. Part of the answer lies with the Pensions Bill and the establishment of the pension protection fund, which will come into force in April 2005—subject to the will of Parliament. The fund will ensure that compensation will be available for members of UK-based schemes whose companies go bust, leaving pension schemes underfunded. More than 10 million scheme members will benefit from the security of the new fund.

We also believe, as do more far-sighted business leaders, that business will benefit because the PPF will increase confidence in defined benefit schemes, and will increase their effectiveness as a recruitment and retention tool. The more successful we are in returning Britain to a land of full employment in which vacancies become the challenge rather than unemployment, the more people will ask serious questions about pension schemes at job interviews.

If we learn the lessons from it properly, the Pensions Benefit Guaranty Corporation gives a reasonable guide to how we should establish the fund, although we have brought in flexibilities, in terms of the levy, that are not available to the US scheme. Questions of moral hazard mean that there will inevitably be some differences in treatment between groups and companies. We have taken the utmost care to minimise the effect of that.

By providing 90 per cent. compensation subject to PPF rules for members under the scheme's normal pension age, we will ensure that compensation remains meaningful, while incentivising key decision makers to keep their schemes outside the PPF. Regulations in force in advance of the PPF mean that the debt on a solvent employer whose scheme winds up underfunded is calculated on the basis that the scheme should be able to meet the full benefits that scheme members have accrued and expect to receive, as well as the full costs of winding-up. Trustees can use the regulations if their scheme started to wind up on or after 11 June 2003.

For schemes that start to wind up on or after 10 May this year, we have also amended the priority order to ensure that assets are shared more fairly between non-pensioner and pensioner scheme members. That has been achieved by moving pensioners' future indexation down the priority order, after the accrued rights of non-pensioner members. That has a significant impact on the rights of non-pensioner scheme members.

Importantly, the new pensions regulator—another feature of the Bill—will build further security and confidence, providing an early warning system of possible problems in scheme administration, assisting in protecting members and helping to limit calls on the PPF. The regulator will build on the expertise and experience of the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority, but will be more flexible and more proactive. It will concentrate its efforts on schemes where it assesses that there is a high risk to members because of bad governance, poor administration or fraud.

We are making real and substantial reforms to protect scheme members for the future, but we acknowledge that the PPF will not help some members. We have not ignored them. Through the financial assistance scheme, we will offer help to people who have lost out on their final salary pension due to their scheme winding up underfunded. Our commitment—at £400 million of public money—provides a sound basis, we would argue, for a worthwhile assistance scheme for those who face the most significant losses to their pension benefits.

The hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr asked about the assistance scheme. Hon. Members will be aware that it is our duty to ensure that it is workable and affordable. It would be wrong for us rashly to announce details of the scheme without full and proper consideration. That would adversely affect those who have already been subjected to enough speculation and would be both unfair and misleading. We will not be pushed into making statements before the scheme has been fully formulated. It is a difficult and complex area of work, and we want to ensure that we get it right.

Hon. Members, of course, have particular schemes on their minds that affect their constituents. I respect that, and there are some high-profile schemes. However, when I note that we have had to seek information from about 250 different company pension schemes, it might give hon. Members some idea of the scale of the challenge and the complexity of the task before us.

We can say that we are making progress. In May, I gave a clear timetable for how the scheme would develop. We are sticking to that timetable. I understand why hon. Members ask, "When will we hear?" but I have set out the timetable and we are on track.

As promised, a data report giving our initial estimate of people affected was laid before Parliament in June. We have been in discussion with stakeholders, trade unions, key representatives from business and the pensions industry, and scheme members affected. In addition, we have been advised by a group of pensions experts who have met us regularly over the summer.

The hon. Member for Northavon asked whether I could give details about the nature of the scheme. I cannot yet. Our plan is to produce more details at the end of this year and to have the scheme in place by the spring, with payments being made as soon as possible thereafter. I have already stated those things, and that is the timetable to which we are working. By spring, we intend to have the legislative framework in place with a view to being able to make the payments.

I have been asked about the so-called gap year, and the hon. Member for Yeovil was particularly concerned about two schemes. Various people have mentioned Turner and Newall. As far as that situation is concerned, we understand that discussions are ongoing. It would be wrong for me to pre-empt the outcome of those discussions, or for us to assume that the scheme will wind up.

We are of course sympathetic to the Turner and Newall pension scheme members, who are left in great uncertainty at present. I have met several hon. Members to discuss the scheme. We continue to monitor the situation closely and look forward to positive developments. Only last week, as has been noted, I was pleased to hear about further progress—namely, the new offer from US investors, which is being considered by the administrator and trustees of the scheme. We hope that the company will meet its obligations to the employees and achieve a beneficial outcome for all parties concerned. However, the recent developments support our view that, until those discussions are complete, it would be wholly inappropriate for any of us to draw conclusions about the future of the schemes.

The hon. Member for Yeovil mentioned another scheme and promised to write to me about it. I will respond to that, which is the appropriate way to deal with a scheme that I am not knowledgeable about at this moment.

Mr. Laws: Leaving aside the Turner and Newall scheme, does the Minister agree that it would be wholly unfair if a group of individuals fell between the two forms of compensation and protection that the Government are putting in place and therefore received no compensation at all? How would he justify that to the affected individuals?

[Mr. Laws]

Malcolm Wicks: As I have noted, schemes winding up after 10 May 2004 will be helped by the changes to the priority order. However, I do not want to exaggerate the proportion of support that that brings; it is not the whole answer. We have said before that, for that year, we have not ruled out support from the financial assistance scheme, and of course we are sympathetic. We are closely monitoring the situation as it develops for that one-year period.

Mr. Webb: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: May I carry on?

We need to take moral hazard seriously. For wholly British companies and companies that are foreign owned and that have a complexity of ownership because of globalisation, we must be careful that we do not say things too rashly that might encourage companies to dump their pension liabilities on the British taxpayer. They as companies should be responsible. That is what I mean by moral hazard in this situation. We must all be careful of how we speak about the issue to avoid such difficulty. There is also an implication not only for the financial assistance scheme but for the PPF as we approach the April period, when it might be difficult, or require some analysis, to determine whether the FAS or PPF might be liable for one scheme or another. There is complexity to the matter.

I use the word "sympathy" but I realise that sympathy butters no scones. However, when we have talked about our sympathy, we have followed it up with action—with the PPF and the FAS. I am concerned about, and sympathetic to, those who will fall in that year. I hope that the hon. Member for Yeovil understands my meaning.

Primary Schools (Stevenage)

3.33 pm

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): I am pleased to have this opportunity to air a subject that is causing my constituents and me a great deal of distress and, if plans go through, is likely to cause us even more. I am here to ask the Minister to listen to our problem and to do all that he can to persuade Hertfordshire county council to rerun its recent review and consultation on primary provision in Stevenage.

I shall try to give the background to the problem, discuss Hertfordshire's solution and then say what we in Stevenage would like to be done. Historically, Stevenage has had a large number of surplus primary school places. That has been true for almost a decade, and at present there are 1,590 surplus places, or nine and a half forms of entry. This is both a problem and an opportunity.

I was glad when, this January, Hertfordshire county council decided to address the problem by holding a review of the surplus primary school places. I was even gladder when, in a speech to the school governors and head teachers concerned, the county council officials said that the review would be transparent and clear, and that they would publish the 11 criteria on which they had based their decisions. We heard nothing at all from January until late May, however, and only a strong rumour at the beginning of June that the county council would indeed publish its review, but that the review was delayed because of the postponement of the local elections until 10 June.

I assumed, as did many head teachers, teachers and parents, that the review would be published in September and that the consultation would end around Christmas. Hon. Members may imagine my surprise when, on 21 June, we were sent the review and discovered that the consultation period was just under nine and three quarter weeks, and that it was due to start in the few hectic weeks before the schools closed for the summer holidays and end on 31 August. In other words, it was perfectly timed to fit two thirds of it into the school holidays.

When consulting on the closure of six primary schools, people do not usually allow such a small window of opportunity or hold the consultation in the holidays. Not surprisingly, the parents, many of whom are here today, were deeply suspicious of the county council's motives. I do not know whether it was carelessness or whether it was contrived, but whatever it was, the timetable has been most inconvenient and difficult.

The summer holidays are traditionally a time when we all forget about things such as politics, primary provision and schools, go away and sit on a beach or walk in the hills—but local parents did not do that this summer. Instead, they spent their time organising. I have in my hand a petition of 8,000 signatures of parents in Stevenage who are against the county council's proposals, and I shall present it to the House of Commons later this week. The parents also ensured that the county council received a record number of response forms; one county official told me that the council had received 100 per cent. more than usual.

More than 3,000 response forms were returned to the county council, of which 97.3 per cent. were from people who were against the council's proposals.

What were the proposals that caused so much consternation? As I said, Stevenage has a long-standing problem with surplus primary school places, particularly in the southern end of the town, in which the population is ageing and where, because of housing inflexibilities, we have been unable to build the sort of housing that would allow older people to move out of their large houses into smaller ones. Numbers in the schools were therefore going down. The review dealt with two schools in the centre of Stevenage and four in the south of the town.

One usually expects reviews to list the options considered, and the reasons why some are good and some bad. One also expects stakeholders to be given a choice. The people of central Stevenage were the lucky ones: they were given exactly one choice. They were told that one school in the centre of the town, either Pin Green or Bedwell, would have to close, and that was it. There was nothing else. No other solutions—believe you me, there are many—were considered.

As I said, the people of central Stevenage turned out to be the lucky ones, because the review said quite baldly that in the south of Stevenage it could not possibly recommend anything else but the merger of four schools to create a primary school that is very large for Hertfordshire. Hertfordshire's 20 most successful schools have no more than 300 pupils, and its largest primary school has 560 pupils. The school proposed for the south of Stevenage would have to have 842 pupils, which is a lot. There are only about seven schools in the whole country that are that large—I know that the Minister happens to have one of them in his own constituency. However, I would point out to him that there are special circumstances in Stevenage, involving a history of very low achievement.

Parents, local politicians and I found it deeply insulting that the review document was entitled, "Raising Standards in Stevenage". Over the years—certainly over the 10 years that I have been living in Stevenage—standards have been very low. They are the lowest in Hertfordshire. When I moved to the town in 1995, I was shocked to find that only one third of children who left school at 11 to go to secondary school could read. Is it surprising that those children did not do well in their GCSEs, or that they did not go on to A-levels or university? Is it surprising that in 1995 there was 11 per cent. youth unemployment in the town? Much of it was caused by the fact that the youths were unemployable because they were illiterate. Remember: only one third of the children could read at the age of 11.

Since 1997 that situation has been reversed and now about 80 per cent. of children who leave primary school can read at the age of 11 and are fit for secondary school. Standards have been raised, particularly in the primary area. However, until then almost nothing had been done, except by Stevenage borough council, which is very good. It is the only Labour-held district council in the east of England and it ran the Raise project, which helped to raise academic achievement, but which had to stop because Hertfordshire county council would not go on funding it. That is the commitment that the county council has to raising achievement and that is why we were so insulted when it produced the review under that title. At least it could have spared us that insult.

What has happened since then? The parents got their responses in and the county council held an education panel meeting at which it very narrowly voted through the proposals for the centre of Stevenage. It agreed to issue the statutory notices to close Pin Green school and decided in principle to proceed with the merger of the four schools in southern Stevenage, but it realised that it had not convinced the parents so it decided to have "more discussions" with them.

That is not what the parents want, or what I want. We want the consultation to be rerun, because we believe that it was deeply flawed. We have gone into the matter in great detail, using the council's own standards, which it helpfully published on its website. The introduction to the standards says that there is no point in consulting unless the county council is prepared to change its mind. It has demonstrated no such preparedness. In fact, in the face of 97.3 per cent. of the people being against the proposals, it has gone ahead with just a pause in the proceedings, not a rerun.

We feel that that is undemocratic, and many of my constituents have lost faith in the whole process of democracy. They cannot understand how we are so powerless that we can secure only the tiny victory of a stay of execution. I have letters from 241 parents asking me to refer the matter to the local government ombudsman, and I shall do so. If that fails, I shall submit the case for judicial review, because the council did not adhere to its own standards. One of those standards specifies a 12-week consultation when dealing with voluntary bodies such as parent-teacher associations and governing bodies. Only nine and a half weeks was allowed for consultation, but that was during the holidays, and yet another standard says that the holidays should have been taken into account. In this case, if the holidays were taken into account at all, that could only have been part of an attempt to railroad the closure through. I hope that that is not the case, but I fear that it might be.

The element of consultation is giving people a choice—[interruption] pardon me for sniffing, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I always get a cold when I have an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know exactly how the hon. Lady feels. I have one myself.

Barbara Follett: You have my sympathy, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

At no stage were people consulted on whether they wanted a school of the proposed size. At their January meeting, the heads and governors were told that the model for change throughout the town would be a two-form entry school. That could have worked quite well. I shall not bore the House with the many permutations that might have been satisfactory to parents and which would have prevented the logjam of traffic that we shall get if the new school uses the two ancient asbestos-ridden sets of buildings on the Long Meadow site. It is not proposed to provide new accommodation. Instead, we will have to use buildings erected in the 1950s and 1960s that have asbestos in them, and they will have to be bodged together into one big primary school. That is simply not on. There will also have to be mixed-age classes; again, that is simply not on.

Parents feel that this was sprung on them, and they were surprised. They were called to public meetings. I did not attend them, but parents have told me that they were among the worst run meetings they have attended. They did not have the chance to speak. The meetings were totally chaotic. Parents were bombarded with statistics by county officers, who were plainly nervous—and many of the statistics were wrong. The officers included Graveley school, which is in north Hertfordshire, not in Stevenage, in the list of schools; that raised the average achievement levels, which is simply sloppy. In some of their demographic projections—probably because the county council is in collective denial about future developments—officers ignored the additional housing that will probably be built to the west of Stevenage. They ignored the big demographic changes in the area that will see the ageing population shift from the south of the town.

Officers also made it clear to parents at the consultation meeting that if they kept their children at Pin Green school, which was threatened with closure, they would not be guaranteed suitable places for their children in September 2005, nor would any attempt be made to put the children in schools with their siblings or friends. That was not quite coercion, but it was certainly powerful persuasion. Not unnaturally, the parents moved their children, which allowed one of the county council officials to say at the education panel meeting, "Well, Pin Green school effectively closed itself." No, it did not. The county council slowly throttled it to death. They began the throttling process last year when they told the governors of Pin Green school not to appoint a head until the review had been completed. That marked it down as a finished school.

The parents and I are asking the county council for the consultation to be rerun on democratic lines—for people to be consulted, for a consensus to be arrived at and eventually for us to be properly consulted on several proper options. That is even more important because the bodged review and consultation dealt not with the entire problem, which involves nine and a half forms of entry, but with only three and a half forms. That means that we shall soon need another review.

The Stevenage heads wrote to me and to county hall—I have copied the letter to the Secretary of State—expressing their total dismay at how the process was conducted. The county council knew of the problem. Instead of making it into a plus, and seeing it as a way to use the surplus places to raise achievement in a town that has historically had low achievement, it missed the opportunity. I am here today to ask my hon. Friend to try to persuade the council to do otherwise. Hertfordshire has ignored Stevenage for too long. About 1,000 children are involved and we want our parents to have a say in how their children are educated, now and in the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: For the sake of clarity following the Division in the House, the way in which the Standing Order works means that this debate will now have to close by 4.3 pm.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) on securing this debate and on her tireless work in campaigning on behalf of her constituency for higher educational standards. That is reflected in her work in securing this debate and in the petition that she said that she will present in the presence of a number of parents and governors from Stevenage.

My hon. Friend's commitment to raising standards in education matches the Government's commitment. As she said, the county council has stated in respect of its aims for the review that it wishes to raise achievement in Stevenage. I am well aware of the great interest and concern that people living in Stevenage have shown in respect of the review of primary school provision in the centre and south of the town. I appreciate the anxieties that are involved when school closures and reorganisations are considered. My hon. Friend made the important point that falling rolls can provide not only a problem, but an opportunity. That is a good starting point and I hope that today's debate will enable the strength of local feeling and parental concern about the issue to be placed firmly on the record.

I reassure my hon. Friend and her constituents that we believe that we have good arrangements in place for taking forward any significant changes that follow the review that Hertfordshire has undertaken. That is to ensure that the concerns of her constituents, which she has expressed so clearly today, are given due consideration. I must make it clear from the outset that any decision on reorganising school provision as a result of such a review will not be taken by me or my ministerial colleagues. The decision will be made locally, as it would be anywhere else, by the local education authority. Such decisions were devolved to local level in September 1999, because they are best decided locally, where the full range of factors and issues can be considered in context. That view not only is held by the Government, but has widespread agreement.

Each local education authority is responsible for looking at the needs of its area and ensuring that there are sufficient school places. That responsibility involves the need to balance the supply of places, to ensure that schools serve the needs of their local communities and to provide good-quality education in a cost-effective way. Often, with population changes over the years, there will be an imbalance or a need for new provision. Local education authorities can propose changes. When the proposed changes are significant, as is the case in Stevenage, a number of stages must be gone through before the changes can be implemented. There are safeguards involved in that process to ensure that changes are made in an open, democratic way.

The first stage is consultation, with all interested parties being consulted before formal proposals are published. The local education authority has a duty to allow adequate time and must provide sufficient information to those involved. The second stage is publication. If the outcome of consultation is a decision to proceed, a formal notice detailing proposals must be published widely, including in a local newspaper and at the main entrances of the schools that are named in the proposals. People usually have a minimum of six weeks in which to submit their representations in support of or against proposals. An LEA may make the final decision on proposals that it has published only if there have been no objections. In all other cases, the proposals must be passed to the local school organisation committee. If that committee cannot reach a unanimous decision, the proposals must be passed to the independent schools adjudicator for a final decision.

On consultation, and on the concerns that have been raised by my hon. Friend in respect of Hertfordshire's handling of the review of primary provision in Stevenage, the Department does not specify precise arrangements, such as a timetable to be followed, or how options should be set out. Nevertheless, it must be recognised that LEAs have statutory responsibility for school place planning. Therefore, in the first instance, it is for them to consider options, taking into account specific local circumstances and their judgment as to the feasibility of a range of options.

We allow maximum flexibility, so that consultation can be tailored to local needs. Nevertheless, our guidance on school organisation arrangements makes it clear that the formal consultation prior to any publication must set out what is proposed in such a way that those affected understand what is involved and how they can make their views known. Furthermore, if proposals are to be taken up following consultation, the school organisation committee must consider whether the consultation undertaken was adequate before accepting formal proposals for consideration.

Of course, the arrangements for the work of school organisation committees fall under the jurisdiction of the local government ombudsman, who can investigate complaints of maladministration. I note my hon. Friend's plans to refer this case to the ombudsman. Beyond the ombudsman, there is the option to go to court and to seek judicial review. My hon. Friend has placed on record the possibility that that route will be used.

I understand that, while Hertfordshire county council has decided to revisit options for the south of Stevenage, it has also been decided to proceed with plans for the centre, in particular to close Pin Green primary school and nursery. To proceed, the LEA will need to move to the second step of the process I described earlier—to publish formal proposals. That will give all interested parties the opportunity to raise further, formal objections. If that happens, those will have to be considered by the local school organisation committee before a final decision to close the school can be made.

It is important to understand that the school organisation committee operates independently of the LEA. It represents the main education stakeholders in the area and consists of five or six groups, each having one vote on each proposal—there is an LEA representative, one each from the Church of England and Roman Catholic dioceses and the learning and skills council, and a schools group representing school governors and head teachers. In deciding on proposals, the school organisation committee takes into account their effect on educational standards, as well as their contribution to school improvement, and the need for places in the area and any financial implications, alongside the views of interested parties, including parents and the wider community, to which my hon. Friend has given voice today.

My hon. Friend has raised the issue of the possible outcome of the process in terms of the size of a planned new primary school. In our guidance, of which account must be taken, we make it clear that there should be no blanket assumption that a certain size of school is good or bad. She referred to an example in Enfield, in my constituency—Wilbury school, which has 900 pupils. It is one of the largest schools in the country. Clearly, the school that is being considered in her constituency, with 842 pupils, would come into the same category. There is no firm evidence one way or the other as to whether bigger or smaller schools can be considered better. We have many examples of schools that do well and happen to be very large, and others, also doing well, that are very small. We believe that those matters are best decided locally by those who know the area best. That is clearly the issue of contention that will move forward following today's debate.

We believe that decisions on changes to education provision in an area are best taken in that local area. Only then can everything be considered in its full context. We believe that the arrangements that have been made allow that and work well. I nevertheless appreciate the real concerns that my hon. Friend and her constituents have expressed about primary education in Stevenage, and, in particular, about the handing of consultation on the review. I am convinced that there are safeguards and that arrangements for the remainder of the process should ensure an outcome that will best serve the interests of everyone—higher standards for the pupils of Stevenage, for which my hon. Friend argued powerfully.

I thank my hon. Friend for placing the concerns of her constituents, and parents in particular, on the record. On behalf of the Department, I express the hope that a full process will be followed through, enabling everyone concerned with the education of children and young people in Stevenage to have their say, and have their say respected.

Pensions Scheme (Federal-Mogul)

4.1 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): I beg your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I would like to allow one or two of my hon. Friends to intervene on my speech as there is huge interest in what has happened to our constituents in connection with the pension scheme in question. Since I asked for this debate on behalf of my constituents who work or have worked for Federal-Mogul on the Bradford site, there has been some hopeful news and a rescue package could be on the cards. Nevertheless, it is important to debate the issues and the lead-up to the crisis.

The Minister will be aware of the Federal-Mogul pension crisis faced by 40,000 people in the UK, but the situation at the Bradford plant is, I believe, unique: the workers are to be made redundant as well. The plant is closing and work is being transferred to plants in Poland and Turkey, no doubt to take advantage of lower wages.

Diana Organ (Forest of Dean) (Lab): As my hon. Friend will be aware, the situation affecting her constituents in Bradford also affects my constituents in Lydney, where the closure of No. 1 foundry means job losses for 130 of 330 employees. I am sure that her concern, like mine, is for what happens to people who are made redundant now, in the midst of the corporate chaos over the pension scheme for deferred members.

Mrs. Mahon: We certainly share the same concerns, and we both have to face workers who are in despair.

I stress that although the employees of Federal-Mogul deserve the sympathy, help and support of us all, and I include the Government in that, I am firmly of the view that Federal-Mogul must foot the bill for the pensions. It is an asset-rich company, and it now looks as if the administrator and its pension fund trustee may make an offer. We all hope that a happy resolution can be achieved.

The problem started when the former employees of Turner and Newall and their unions were told that no money was available to fund their pension scheme, because the parent company in the United States faced insolvency. There were worrying aspects to the lead-up to the situation, as the company had chosen to take 15 of the past 18 years as contribution holidays, with Federal-Mogul responsible for three of the past five years. They were allowed to do that because the law in this country is inadequate.

In a very good emergency resolution at the TUC conference on 14 September, the seriousness of the situation was recognised and Amicus and the Transport and General Workers Union outlined the situation facing workers. I think it is worth quoting a little from that resolution, which was passed unanimously. It says:

> "Congress recognised that whilst American workers in the same company are protected by an insurance scheme, workers in the UK, until April . . . are not. Congress supports the joint unions in asking the Government to investigate and if necessary intervene to bring about a successful resolution to the issue. Joint unions also believe that the inadequate insolvency law should be made stronger to protect workers and pensions."

That is what I want to talk about.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) and the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), met the workers at Federal-Mogul in Bradford and were concerned about their dilemma and worries. Is it not time for the Government to act to protect workers' rights and pension rights, not just for the Federal-Mogul workers but for workers throughout the UK?

Mrs. Mahon: Hear, hear; I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. That is why, although there might be a rescue for that particular pension scheme and although I know that the Government are undertaking a pension review and considering all aspects of the matter, I urge them to concentrate on that particular idea.

Since the TUC, events have moved on. All parties—the joint trade unions, the independent trustee, the administrator and the company—have been meeting to try to resolve the crisis. Hopes were raised when the company admitted that it had a moral and, indeed, a legal obligation to the workers. However, workers remained deeply concerned for many months because rumours persistently circulated that the company would not put in sufficient funds to honour the pensions commitment.

I have had a heartbreaking correspondence with constituents, particularly with someone whose retirement looked uncertain, and with a man who was 24 hours from being made redundant with his full pension rights, only to be told that he might have lost those rights. It was devastating, and when I met the workers—I, too, met them, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe)—some were in despair.

However, a news item that offers hope appeared in the Financial Times on 14 October. The article, headlined "Hopes Rise for T and N pension rescue", says:

> "Hopes of a rescue for some or all of the pensions of the 40,000 former and current employees of T and N, the car parts company in administration, have been raised by an 11th hour offer by Carl Icahn, the US investor. Terms of the offer were received by T and N's administrator and its pension fund trustee last night."

So, it looks as if an acceptable offer might be on the way. If that is the case, I am pleased.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that we have just come from a meeting where, I am pleased to say, the administrator and the trustee spoke robustly in defence of British interests, which are also before the court this week? Indeed, it seems that the clock will go right back to when chapter 11 was invoked and that despite all that has happened in between—even redundancies now being discussed in the constituency of one of our other hon. Friends—arrangements will be honoured in full as though the receivership or chapter 11 had never happened. One question, involving £80 million, is outstanding. In the context of what we face, that is a relatively small sum, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will join me in urging the American side to get over that last hurdle and fund the full amount.

Mrs. Mahon: Absolutely. There are things that need to be ironed out, but we have reason for hope. I agree with my hon. Friend that the amount left is small compared with the massive amount on the table. That offer is clearly welcome and we all hope for a positive conclusion.

However, I want to move on because it is clear that the Government action in making pension schemes more secure has been welcomed by us all. We were all incredibly relieved when the Government took action, albeit with private pension schemes, but more needs to be done. From talking to my constituents, it seems to me that Federal-Mogul could have walked away from its responsibilities to those workers, despite the fact that it was clearly responsible. That is why I urge the Government to act. The workers, the unions and everyone involved have been magnificent in their fightback. They have been on the "Today" programme, and people with no experience of the media whatever have taken up the cudgels and fought. I know that my hon. Friend has formed a little group of Members here with interests in this matter and we have tried our best to highlight what would be a great injustice.

The Government must tighten the law to ensure that this does not happen again. Imagine people working for 20 or 30 years thinking that they have paid in to secure their future and looking forward to some kind of retirement—pension schemes are deferred wages, when all is said and done; they are what we have earned—only to be told, 24 hours from being made redundant or retiring, that their pension schemes are up for grabs.

I congratulate the Government, because the proposed pension protection fund legislation due to come into force in April 2005 represents possibly the first time that any Government have done anything like that in this country. That is to be welcomed because we are relieving a great many people from anxiety, but I would like to see the law made retrospective. I know that it is good that we shall have the fund, but I would like the Government to think again and make it retrospective, because there is a huge welter of misery out there among people who have been caught up in such cases. If the scheme had collapsed, another 40,000 workers would have been added to the 65,000 who are already seeking a share of the pension protection fund. That is why the pension protection fund should be made retrospective.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): The pension protection fund will be there only when schemes fail. The objective must be to stop schemes failing. Two lessons have come out of all the collapses of the past couple of years. One is that the minimum funding requirement calculation has been woefully inadequate, whether that is because of the legislation, the auditors or the actuaries. The other concerns the Treasury rule that says where a scheme is more than 105 per cent. funded, the employer has to take a pension holiday. If that 105 per cent. is based on too low a valuation in the first place, a problem is created. Those factors need sorting out to prevent similar situations in the future.

Mrs. Mahon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for intervening, because he is a bit of an expert on pensions and benefits, and we need that expertise. I am grateful that he spelt the matter out so clearly. The firm has also been responsible for other things, not least the very bad health of its employees due to asbestos, and so on.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I am pleased to hear that there may be a positive outcome to the pensions issue, but my hon. Friend will be aware that many pensioners are also victims of exposure to asbestos. They were facing a horrendous double whammy, but it now appears that all that needs to be sorted out is the compensation for exposure to asbestos. I am advised by the administrator that the people who have been exposed to asbestos by Turner and Newall may receive in compensation only a small proportion of the full value of their claims.

Mrs. Mahon: That is tragic. I know that my hon. Friend has done years of work in this area. He deserves all our thanks for what he has done and how he has exposed such a dreadful abuse of workers.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I hear what my hon. Friend says, and I am sympathetic to what she says about the pension protection fund, but does she agree that on this occasion it has been right not to look for ways for the Government to bail out the company, so as to ensure that it lives up to its responsibilities? The changes that we have seen during the past few days are clear evidence that that pressure has been working.

Mrs. Mahon: Oh yes, I made it absolutely clear at the start of the debate that the firm has the responsibility. It is an asset-rich company and can afford it.

It is good, for now, that the workers of Federal-Mogul have some kind of happy solution, but I urge the Minister to draw on that experience and feed it into the pensions review. We must ensure that our laws protect workers, so that they can have decent security in their retirement. They have worked hard for it and they deserve it.

4.16 pm

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on securing a debate on this important topic, which is of relevance to us all. Her generosity in allowing colleagues to comment was a model of how such short debates can be used, especially as people throughout the country are affected by the problem.

As my hon. Friend will appreciate, I am not the Minister for Pensions, so I shall tread carefully. He apologises for not being able to attend. However, he participated in an earlier debate and I shall draw my hon. Friend's attention to his comments a little later.

[Jane Kennedy]

Many hon. Members will have constituents who have been affected by the winding-up of underfunded pension schemes such as the one that we are considering. Most of my comments will be general because of the nature of the company's position. Indeed, legal proceedings have been started and detailed negotiations are continuing as we speak. Many of us have met people who have suffered such devastating losses. We agree that everything that can be done should be done to help to ensure that Turner and Newall workers do not find themselves in that position.

We are all aware of the difficult situation faced by members of pension schemes that wind up underfunded and without enough money to secure in full the benefits that people may have accrued over a working life. I empathise with all members of pension schemes who do not receive the benefits that they were expecting—and with their families, who are also affected by such circumstances.

The Government appreciate the concerns that many people have about their occupational pension schemes. That is why we have taken action in the Pensions Bill, to which my hon. Friend referred, to prevent people ever again having to suffer the injustice of paying into a pension fund for a lifetime only to find that their pension cannot be paid in full, or even at all.

As I said, negotiations are still ongoing at Turner and Newall. We heard that a meeting upstairs between the chief executive of Federal-Mogul and representatives of the company and its employees will be listening carefully to what is said in this debate. The Minister for Pensions spoke in an earlier debate. Hon. Members and others listening to the debate may want to read the record of that debate to see what he said on the subject.

It would be wrong to pre-empt the outcome of those discussions, or for us to assume that the scheme will wind up. We are sympathetic to the position of members of the Turner and Newall pension scheme, who are left in great uncertainty at present, but we continue to monitor the situation closely and look forward to positive developments.

Only last week, I was pleased to read in the press about further progress—namely, the new offer from US investors that is being considered by the administrator and trustees of the pension scheme. We hope that the company will meet its obligations to the employees and achieve a beneficial outcome for all parties. However, the recent developments support our view that it would be wholly inappropriate for any of us to draw conclusions about the future of the schemes until the discussions are complete.

The Government have made it clear that we believe that a pension promised should be a pension honoured, and that members of final salary schemes should have confidence that the benefits that they have accrued will be paid when they fall due. That is why we have set out to bolster pension security and to protect people from the risks involved with saving in occupational pensions. We are all too aware of the impact of the wind-up of underfunded schemes and the subsequent loss of confidence in saving for retirement. Our reforms set out to restore confidence, so that people can save for their retirement safe in the knowledge that their pension is protected and that they will not face poverty.

The pensions regulator introduced in the Pensions Bill will give better protection to members of work-based pension schemes and reduce the burdens of compliance for well-run schemes. It will focus on protecting the benefits of pension scheme members and concentrate its efforts on schemes where it assesses that there is a high risk of fraud, bad governance or poor administration. The proposals mean that pension scheme members' benefits will be better protected by a regulator that has the flexibility and powers to take a targeted and proportionate approach to protecting the funds held in pension schemes.

The Pensions Bill will also establish the pension protection fund, to which my hon. Friend referred. The PPF will help final salary pension scheme members by providing meaningful compensation should their employer become insolvent and have to wind up the scheme underfunded. I suppose that all hon. Members should declare an interest at this point, as we are all members of such a scheme. The fund will significantly improve protection for pension scheme members and confidence in pensions in general. More than 13 million members of final salary pension schemes could benefit from the security and peace of mind afforded by the PPF.

In May, the Government announced the introduction of the financial assistance scheme, which will offer help to people who lose out before the PPF is introduced. There is a great deal of interest in the scheme from people whose final salary pension has been affected because their pension scheme wound up underfunded and their employer was unable to make up the deficit. Details of the FAS, including who will be eligible and the assistance to be provided, are being developed in consultation with stakeholders such as pension scheme members, trustees, trade unions and key business representatives. We believe that the FAS will greatly increase people's confidence in pensions. It will benefit not only those directly affected but pension providers and the pension industry.

It is not only those measures that will strengthen confidence. Regulations already in force mean that the debt on a solvent employer whose scheme winds up is calculated on the basis that the scheme should be able to meet the full benefits that scheme members have accrued and expect to receive, as well as the full costs of winding-up. Trustees can utilise the regulations if their scheme started to wind up on or after 11 June 2003.

In advance of the PPF, for schemes that start to wind up on or after 10 May 2004, we have amended the priority order to ensure that assets are shared more fairly between non-pensioners and pensioners. We have achieved that by moving pensioners' future indexation down the priority order, after the accrued rights of non-pensioners. That has a significant impact on the rights of non-pensioner scheme members.

In conclusion, I again congratulate my hon. Friend on taking time today to debate the situation faced by employees of Turner and Newall. I am grateful that neither she nor any other hon. Friends asked any technical questions that I might have found a tad embarrassing. We will maintain this debate, both through discussions in this Chamber and on the Floor of the House and through the open dialogue between the Government and my hon. Friends who represent pensioners from Turner and Newall. My hon. Friends are aware that the Government wish to keep that open dialogue very much in process.

I am sorry that I cannot offer more specific assurances to employees that their pension will be protected, but I am sure that hon. Members agree that it would be wholly inappropriate for me to make any promises to scheme members at this stage. We hope that the situation is resolved soon with a positive outcome for all, so that employees can look forward to a secure retirement. In the meantime, we will continue to monitor the situation closely.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Four o'clock.

UK Citizens Detained by US Immigration Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Derek Twigg.]

9.30 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the important subject of United Kingdom citizens who have been detained by the United States immigration service. I shall address some general points before moving on to a specific constituency case.

At one level, foreign travel is relatively straightforward these days. Obtaining a UK passport is reasonably straightforward, and travelling for pleasure and business is common and often not too expensive. However, today's travellers must make certain that, before visiting a foreign country, they are aware of any visa requirements and any restrictions on articles and substances that they may want to take into that country. They should also familiarise themselves with its laws and customs and be aware that its legal and policing methods may not be the same as those in the UK. It would, in fact, be naïve to assume that a country's laws and customs were necessarily the same as those in the UK, and people must be made aware of the fact that similarities in language, history, law, custom and perceptions of friendship may be no more than superficial.

There are, for example, fundamental differences between the UK and the United States of America. Superficially, we have a lot in common: we have a common history and a common language; the US legal framework is very much based on that of the UK; and we have strong economic, political, military and friendship ties. However, the unwary traveller can get into serious trouble in the United States, either out of ignorance or because of the operating procedures used by the immigration service.

In the case of the United States, we must be sensitive to the impact of 9/11 and of the international terrorist attacks that preceded it or which have taken place since. One can only imagine what would be the impact on our political system if an incident like 9/11 were to take place here. There would be an immediate desire for a massive strengthening of security, far beyond what we face now. There would also be a change in the balance between the emphasis on personal liberty and the rights of the individual and the belief that collective security was paramount.

Following 9/11, as the Minister knows, the US Government established the Department of Homeland Security to co-ordinate 22 Cabinet-level agencies connected with that important subject. President Bush signed into law the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act 2001, or the USA PATRIOT ACT, to use the acronym. Obviously, some smart Alec spent a lot of time working out that acronym, and if we can find out who they are, one of our political parties might want to employ them before the general election.

The Act contains numerous provisions that affect immigrants as much as terrorist suspects. They broaden the definitions of terrorism, terrorist activity and terrorist organisations for the purposes of deportability and inadmissibility, create additional mechanisms to enable the Attorney General to detain and deport a non-citizen as a terrorist, and establish a new ground of inadmissibility for the spouses and children of those inadmissible on terrorist grounds.

Historically, the immigration and naturalisation service had responsibility for determining who could be admitted to the United States and for enforcing immigration laws. Following the reorganisation of 1 March 2003 under the Department of Homeland Security, however, two main bureaus were formed in the DHS to handle enforcement: the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Apart from policing immigration and checking for the illegal entry of peoples and materials, the various agencies that make up the DHS have a primary duty to prevent terrorism. That task is truly considerable, both physically and psychologically, as the United States has to secure 8,000 miles of land and border entries as well as more than 300 designated ports of entry: a massive security problem.

Since 9/11, the United States has tightened its border and immigration procedures, with the understandable built-in suspicion that terrorists may be trying to gain access to the USA under the cover of legitimate names, backgrounds and occupations. However, since the new procedures were put in place, given the understandable psychological atmosphere of fear and suspicion after 9/11, many innocent foreign citizens, including those of the UK, have received unnecessarily harsh, arbitrary and at times totally inappropriate treatment.

Furthermore, it is difficult for either such individuals or the Foreign Office to get information from the US authorities or, at times, to obtain either an apology or redress. There have been a number of incidents involving ordinary citizens, as well as one or two high-profile ones. Hon. Members may recall that the well-known British writer, Ian McEwan, attempted to enter the USA via Canada to give a lecture. He is a writer who is much admired by Cherie Blair, the wife of our Prime Minister, and also by Laura Bush, the wife of President Bush. He was stopped at passport control and, for a reason that we do not know, he was refused entry. His passport was then stamped to show that he had been refused entry to the United States.

Following the natural furore over the incident, the United States Government investigated it and apologised to Mr. McEwan. They have now given him a letter to keep in his passport to say that a mistake was made. Once one's passport has a stamp, of course, it is there until the passport is replaced. That was a high-profile case, and I am perfectly prepared to accept that in any large organisation mistakes are made. However, mistakes have been made and incidents have occurred with people who do not have Mr. McEwan's high profile.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

I would also like to consider the fact that a number of individuals now appear on the Department of Homeland Security's preventive lists. The DHS obviously has a whole series of these lists, such as the no-fly list. They can be based on erroneous information. The individuals concerned, and others, can be detained or expelled for minor infringements, and they face the prospect that their passport will bear a stamp advising them that they have been refused entry to the USA or that their name will remain on some computer listing that can be activated by other countries. That is a serious point, which should worry all of us.

There is an understandable desire to use information technology to prevent terrorism, to screen out suspects and to make reaction time very quick indeed. However, we all know only too well from our own experiences with computers, involving either our family interests or business, and from the Government's record on computers—I use the word "Government" to refer to a 20-year period—that a name can get on to a computer by mistake, by the use of the wrong surname, the wrong set of initials, the wrong address or just the wrong biog.

Not only does that person face the prospect of being detained; the greater fear is that once the mistake has been recognised, their name might still appear not only on the main computer list but on those of allied countries. Once that has happened to an individual or their family, not only are they fearful of returning to the United States, but they fear that by travelling elsewhere in the world they could be picked up again—in Berlin, Johannesburg, Rome or wherever—because their name has triggered a whole series of reactions on other computers.

Given 9/11 and the threat from terrorism, it may be that the US Government, their agencies and US public opinion are quite prepared to see individual foreigners discomfited, detained and expelled for the greater good of security. If one believes one is fighting a war, one at times will face those options and difficulties. It is not for me to moralise on that. In 1940 a British Government, largely under pressure from public opinion, rounded up tens of thousands of aliens in this country because they were of German or Italian background. The fact that many of them were Jewish or had fled from fascism was not considered a reason not to detain them. Indeed, in the USA, a similar thing happened after the attack on Pearl harbour, when the Japanese-American community was regarded as a threat.

I accept that there is a balance to be struck, but such procedure is wrong in principle as well as in practice. The United States is likely to suffer further alienation from many of its natural friends unless it rectifies its procedures and the mental attitude that it has instilled in the people in the immigration service, who naturally assume that many foreigners are potential terrorists. I know from the experience of my own family and friends who have recently visited the USA that it is bad enough for those who look roughly like the average American, but the likelihood is that those who, in their deportment or dress, look as though they come from the middle east will psychologically already be regarded as a suspect.

Since 9/11, foreigners have been denied entry to, or expelled from, US ports of entry for a variety of reasons, including on the suspicion of their being active in or supporting terrorist organisations or their political allies, on the suspicion of their being an illegal immigrant, for visa violations, for a failure to notify a previous criminal record and, at times, for just bad luck. Can the Minister give the Chamber any indication of how many UK citizens have been denied entry to the USA since 9/11? How many complaints has the Foreign Office received from UK citizens about unfair or erroneous denial? How many have complained that the treatment that they received ranged from verbal and physical abuse to being handcuffed and shackled at those ports of entry?

On the latter point, the US Government have recognised that there is a problem, not least in public relations, with the visit to London last month of Commissioner Robert Bonner of the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection. He came to London effectively to say that he recognised that the bureau had received complaints from many travellers from the UK and found that > "there was unnecessary rudeness and hostility to people travelling into the US".

He said that he had launched a "professionalism initiative" that incorporated a new code of conduct for staff which > "makes clear that rude or discourteous behaviour is not permitted and is subject to disciplinary action, including termination of employment."

He also said that he realised that the treatment meted out to travellers who had committed

> "minor technical violations, such as overstaying the time allowed under the visa waiver programme", had been

> "grossly disproportionate".

He concluded:

> "We don't want to detain people who don't pose a risk. And in those cases where entry is denied, but the person poses no risk, there are procedures to deal with them that don't involve handcuffing."

To be fair, only a month ago the United States recognised that it has a problem that is serious enough for the man who effectively runs the immigration service to come here to London to issue a public apology. That is a good start. However, the problem is not so much Commissioner Bonner recognising that there is a problem, but how to train and advise the people doing the checks at points of entry to the US. If their approach is to view foreigners as potential terrorists, they will probably continue to take a fairly robust approach to any citizen who may mistakenly have done something that affects their entry. Certainly, the fact that such people are no longer to be shackled and handcuffed is an improvement.

I shall now move from the general to the particular, and the case of two of my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. David Pattison of Beeston in Norfolk. Mr. and Mrs. Pattison flew to the United States on Sunday 25 April 2004, arriving at JFK in New York at 4.50 pm, US time. They were planning to stay in New York for a few days before going to Dallas to stay with Mr. Pattison's former boss, a US citizen. At passport control, on presentation of their passports, they were led to an office after their passports had been swiped. Mr. Pattison was informed that he would be denied entry to the United States and deported because there was an Interpol notification on US records that he owed moneys to the state of Qatar, where he had worked as a finance officer. He denied the allegations but that made no difference. Since then, he has acquired written confirmation from Qatar that he was not wanted for any moneys owed and, some days later, the Qatar embassy in London said that it had no knowledge of any Interpol notification on him.

At the time, Mr. Pattison exercised his right to call the British consulate in New York, but was told that it was unable to help him. Since then, the Foreign Office has said that that procedure was wrong, and it has apologised for what appeared to be a lack of help and sympathy at the time. Mr. Pattison was then informed that he would be taken to a detention centre, while his wife was told that she had to make her own arrangements. Eventually, she went to a hotel. She was, understandably, greatly disturbed, but that appeared to have no effect on the US authorities—simpatico they were not.

After Mrs. Pattison had left, Mr. Pattison was taken to another room with seven other people already inside, where, in his own words:

> "They placed ankle shackles on me, handcuffs, and a wooden thing like a cross was fitted across my chest, and they sat me with the others. We weren't allowed to speak, and we weren't given any food or water. We just sat on chairs with guards in the room."

Eventually, Mr. and Mrs. Pattison were reunited and put on board a return flight to the UK at 6.50 pm on Monday 26 April.

Since then, the commissioner has said that, in such cases, that procedure will no longer apply. I accept that in the USA, people who are regarded as criminals are often shackled and manacled; that takes place at the state level in certain cases. However, we would regard it as an overreaction to say the least. Generally, we do not do that to violent criminals unless they are continually trying to assault the police.

Obviously, Mr. and Mrs. Pattison were shocked and traumatised by what they had endured, but they were also angry and frustrated. That anger and frustration is still with them six months later. On arriving home, Mr. Pattison contacted the Foreign Office seeking an explanation for what had happened. He said that he received little in the way of explanation at the time. Indeed, when Ian Clarke, the senior reporter for our local newspaper, the Dereham and Fakenham Times, contacted the Foreign Office at the beginning of May, he was told:

> "In circumstances where the US immigration department is making a decision on whether or not they are going to let a person into the country, we can't intervene."

Since then, Mr. Pattison and I, as his Member of Parliament, have attempted to gain both redress for what he and his wife endured and answers to questions. I have corresponded with Ministers and arranged a meeting with the Minister's colleague, Baroness Symons, so that she could hear directly from Mr. and Mrs. Pattison. That meeting took place in the House of Lords on 15 June, when Baroness Symons gave us about an hour of her time. She was sympathetic and agreed to follow up a number of points, in particular the alleged arrest warrant issued by Qatar through Interpol and the way in which Mr. and Mrs. Pattison were treated in New York, which she undertook to raise with the US embassy in London.

Sadly, Mr. and Mrs. Pattison believe that now, on 20 October, they are no nearer achieving their objective of obtaining an explanation and an apology from the US Government for their treatment, or an explanation from Interpol about the arrest warrant. In fact, it seems almost impossible for anybody to get an answer. Mr. and Mrs. Pattison cannot; I, as an ordinary Member of Parliament cannot; even the Foreign Office appears to be unable to get an answer from Interpol. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the Pattison case, it is incredibly frustrating that even a major British Government Department cannot get an answer out of Interpol, an organisation that acts as a clearing house through which member states can issue such warrants. That is a major problem.

In reviewing the correspondence between the Foreign Office and Mr. Pattison and myself, I note that Baroness Symons genuinely believes that she and her officials are trying to get answers for Mr. Pattison. I think that they are. Unfortunately, as they make clear, the Foreign Office is in no position to force the US authorities to explain what happens to UK citizens or to apologise for it. Foreign Office officials and Ministers have had numerous meetings, both in London and in Washington, to attempt to persuade the United States that they might have the wrong procedures and that they treat UK citizens and others unfairly. It seems that they have had limited success to date. I am not blaming the Foreign Office; it is a problem for the United States.

We are going through a period of considerable strain in British-American relations, mainly over the war with Iraq. There is a substantial amount of anti-President Bush feeling and, superficially at least, a lot of anti-American feeling. I regret that. I make these points as a convinced friend of the USA and the American people, and I speak more in sorrow than in anger. I hope that the US Government and the Department of Homeland Security will, at least, take note of the fact that British people, and a Member of Parliament such as myself, are feeling frustrated and angry. It will help to explain to them the alienation that they face from many others who will not even give them the benefit of the doubt.

There is also the problem of getting an explanation from Interpol. It seems that the Foreign Office sees itself as no more than an interlocutor between Interpol and individual UK citizens who have fallen foul of an Interpol arrest warrant.

Six months after the traumatic incident, my constituents still feel traumatised, frustrated and angry. They are not alone. Other British citizens have had similar experiences. Mr. Pattison still seeks an explanation and an apology from the US Government. I ask the Minister once again: is there any way in which the Foreign Office can facilitate that for Mr. and Mrs. Pattison? They still seek an explanation from Interpol, and indeed an answer to letters and phone calls. Is there any way in which either the Foreign Office or the Home Office can give Mr. and Mrs. Pattison practical help?

Finally, Mr. and Mrs. Pattison want closure on the experience. They feel very nervous indeed about foreign travel, certainly to the USA, which it is almost impossible for them to enter at the moment, but also elsewhere. Mr. Pattison feels that his passport has literally been marked. What guarantee has he that his name is not included on various suspect lists that are not only held by the United States, but copied out to friendly Governments? We know that that is the procedure.

The citizen is at his most vulnerable. I remind the Chamber of what is printed on the front of all our passports:

> "Her Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State Requests and requires in the Name of Her Majesty all those whom it may concern to allow the bearer to pass freely without let or hindrance, and to afford the bearer such assistance and protection as may be necessary."

Obviously, that was written when few people had passports, but it puts an onus on a friendly allied nation to treat our citizens in a reasonably civilised way, at least, and to accept that it may genuinely make mistakes. Finally, the Foreign Office has a duty of care to its citizens because they are taxpayers, and because it is right.

9.56 am

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate and allowing us to discuss and deliberate on the plight of British citizens who have fallen foul of the American immigration authorities. I have listened carefully to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman, and to the circumstances he related as to how his constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Pattison, were treated and, to some extent, humiliated by the agency.

In support of the hon. Gentleman's case, I will highlight the experiences of my constituent, Mrs. Maureen Mordente, a 63-year-old grandmother from Dundee. She suffered at the hands of the American immigration agency when she attempted to enter the USA at Los Angeles airport on 12 February 2003. Mrs. Mordente, who is an extremely pleasant, caring and warm individual, had made a lengthy, long-awaited and eagerly anticipated trip of 11 and a half hours from London to visit her daughter, son-in-law and seven-year-old granddaughter, having not seen them since 2000. Her visit, however, was brutally cut short, as she made it no further into America than the immigration control desk and detention centre at LA airport.

Mrs. Mordente's excitement on arrival soon turned to anxiety when, after a long wait to have her passport and visa waiver form checked, the officials at the desk subjected her documents to lengthy scrutiny. After some sharp and tense discussion, she was asked to accompany immigration officials to a side room for a lengthy, tense and eventually tearful investigation. During that intimidating process, it became clear that on a visit to the United States over the festive season of 1997–98, Mrs. Mordente had inadvertently breached the conditions of her 90-day visa waiver by staying in the US for 103 days—13 days over the limit—primarily because of her daughter's illness. At that time, she was not aware of the breach of visa requirements, nor was it picked up or pointed out as she left the country in 1998, or when she re-entered and left in 2000 during a holiday with her daughter.

It is obvious that the visa infringement was logged due to the heightened attention to security after 11 September 2001—which I do not dispute is necessary—and that it caught up with Mrs. Mordente on that fateful trip, much to her cost and distress. Her treatment during the questioning, which went on for six consecutive hours, was brusque and intimidating. She knew that things were going wrong, but she believed that she would eventually be allowed to enter the United States and meet her family, who were still waiting on the other side of the immigration barriers, in the land of the free. She was allowed one telephone call, but her hopes were soon dashed as, after the questioning, she was rushed into another room, where she was fingerprinted and several photographs were taken, the last of which, it was explained, was a mugshot for her criminal record, which was to be retained in the United States. She was advised that she would be detained over night and deported back to the UK the very next day.

As hon. Members can imagine, the night that Mrs. Mordente passed in a cage in the LA airport detention centre was the most hellish experience that had ever been inflicted on her. That Dundee granny had lived a fairly quiet life but, after crying most of the night, she was deported straight back to London the next day, without her or her family having any chance to make a legal challenge to such an abrupt, arbitrary detention in and eviction from a country that prides itself on its legal system and which has a long, honoured history of seeking and promoting liberty. Nor, I believe, did the British consular service become involved in the sorry tale, despite the call that Mrs. Mordente's family made to the British consulate in Los Angeles.

The one glimmer of hope was that when Mrs. Mordente was taken from her cage to the departure lounge, after that shocking, searing sequence of events, the US immigration officer who escorted her left her with these parting words: "You're not banned from the USA, Mrs. Mordente; all you have to do is get right on down to the American embassy when you get back to the UK and get your visa sorted out. You're always welcome here in the USA, Mrs. Mordente." It seems that customer care was evident in Los Angeles.

On returning to the UK, Mrs. Mordente apprised me of her troubles. However shocked and upset as she undoubtedly was, with those friendly parting words ringing in her ears, she contacted the American consular service and doggedly attempted to obtain a visa to allow her to return to the USA. She pointed out that her husband, who in 1997–98 had also infringed the 90-day limit in the visa waiver rules but did not accompany her on the fateful trip to Los Angeles in February 2003, also applied for a visa at the same time, now starkly aware of what awaited him if he attempted to enter the United States using a visa waiver form.

Just to ensure that things would be done properly, I wrote to the then American ambassador, Mr. William Farish, whom I had met at a lunch that he hosted for the all-party parliamentary British-American group, of which I was a member. Indeed, the previous year, in 2002, I had been a guest of the American State Department and was given a card asking the American people to help me, an honoured guest in the United States, in any activity or with any problems that I might have during my two-week stay as a member of a group visiting the United States. Mr. Farish's response, which was polite and civil, as was his manner at the dinner, voiced regret that Mrs. Mordente felt that she had been unfairly treated during her short stay in the USA and recommended that she apply for a visa.

The visa application progressed. Mrs. Mordente was interviewed on 15 July 2003, but was still awaiting news of whether she would be given a visa for entry to the United States again, hopefully to revisit her family there, in September that year. The disturbing thing was that her husband had already received the news that he would be given a 10-year visa, despite his breach of the waiver conditions in 1997–98. Not until November, following my further intervention, did she receive the long-awaited news. Unfortunately it was not good: as a result of her deportation, she was ineligible to enter the United States for 10 years.

Given the success of Mrs. Mordente's husband, she, her family and everyone involved, including me, was devastated at the news. For an overstay of 13 days, this quiet, peace-loving grandmother was given a sentence of 10 years without appeal. In a further letter from the United States embassy following my approach in December, it was also made clear to me that it was very unlikely that she would be allowed a further visa entry to the United States for a further 10 years. That is 10 years of exile from her daughter and granddaughter—her loved ones—who are now settled and applying for American citizenship on the other side of the world; her daughter is married to an American citizen.

As with the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk, the local press had picked up the case and there was a story on 23 December 2003 in the Evening Telegraph—called "The Tele" in Dundee—under the banner headline "Banned in the USA", a parody of Bruce Springsteen's song "Born in the USA".

On 6 January this year, at the end of my tether, I wrote as a constituency MP to the Foreign Secretary. Baroness Symons responded to my request for Government intervention on 3 February, in similar terms to the reply that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk received:

> "Please pass on my sympathies to Mrs. Mordente for what must be a frustrating situation."

To describe the situation as frustrating was an understatement; it was horrendous. She continued:

> "However, the operation of the US Visa Waiver programme is solely at the direction of the US Government . . . Under international law we are unable to interfere in the immigration procedures of another country."

It is disgrace that the USA, a country in which the constitution enshrines a Bill of Rights guaranteeing basic freedoms for its own citizens, can treat honest, ordinary, hard-working, decent British citizens in such a way. I am not advocating that America should lower its guard against terrorism; nor am I anti-American because, as is the case for many Scots, lots of my relatives emigrated to the United States and I still have close contacts there. My mother goes out every year to visit family and I am glad to say that she has never fallen foul of the immigration service. I studied American politics and history at university and I am a close observer of the political scene in the USA, but given the nature of American society and its creditable role in the world, I believe that with that power comes responsibilities. A country that is at the forefront in size, technology and industry should at least be able to devise a system that can check whether cases are genuine, perhaps in conjunction with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and British police. It should show a little sense and sensitivity.

I am also disappointed by the FCO response. First, there appeared to be no involvement by the British consular service in Los Angeles; secondly, it is apparent that nothing can be done through diplomatic channels to ensure that cases such as those that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk and I have raised can be reviewed or go to appeal to secure some form of satisfactory conclusion.

It may be apt to point out that earlier this week in the matter of deploying the Black Watch, Dundee's local regiment, in support of America, the British Government are clearly all too happy to do everything they can to assist our oldest ally. It is a pity that that sentiment appears not to be reciprocated. When there are genuine cases of unfair treatment of British citizens, there seems to be no redress and no understanding between our two countries. I hope that the debate secured by the hon. Gentleman brings about a change in attitudes and that the FCO, even at this late stage, can do something. The hon. Gentleman, the Pattisons, Mrs. Mordente and I will be grateful if it can.

10.10 am

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), not only on securing the debate but on the exceptionally assiduous manner in which he has pursued his constituents' interests. I thank him for raising the matter in this House; it gives us an opportunity to examine the human cost of decisions that are taken—sometimes at a very senior level in the Government, as has clearly been the case in the United States—and the impact that they can have.

I also commend The Daily Telegraph. In preparation for this debate I have had cause to review some cuttings from that newspaper, and it seems to me that it has done a great deal to bring to light the problems experienced not only by Mr. Pattison but by other UK citizens in travelling to the United States.

I will listen with great interest to what the Minister has to say. Many of the legitimate concerns expressed by the hon. Members for Mid-Norfolk and for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) are matters for the US Government; they are essentially internal matters. We can, of course, express our concerns and hope that that will have an influence but, beyond that, if our colleagues on the other side of the pond choose not to act on our expressions of concern, we as individuals must make our own decisions.

At the start of his speech, the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk appropriately reminded us of the importance of our relationship with the United States. As with all close friends, it is important that we should be seen as being not uncritical. It is therefore appropriate that we highlight the concerns of our constituents in this public way today. It is also to the hon. Gentleman's credit that he reminded us of our own wartime conduct in interning people whom we perceived at that time to be some sort of threat. We should remind ourselves that, in the past, we have not been immune to that sort of attitude.

On the wider front, the greatest value of today's debate will be in examining our own procedures and questioning whether some of the things that we are doing in response to 9/11 could threaten some of the freedoms that we seek to protect.

[Mr. Alistair Carmichael]

I have considered some of the most recent measures taken by the United States in the name of security, and I wonder how effective they will be. One can see the point of photographing and finger-scanning tourists who enter the country, but I question the effectiveness of the suggestion that every tourist should provide a complete record of their whereabouts in the United States before they can board the plane in the UK. For that to be effective, it would require a massive checking exercise, and it is difficult to imagine how the matter would be pursued if the person in question were to depart from the itinerary in any way. Perhaps it is not surprising that, since 9/11, there has been a 30 per cent. drop in the number of overseas tourists entering the United States. I hope that that may also serve as a salutary reminder to our Government about the possible impact of any unnecessarily draconian measures.

The hurt, anxiety and upset felt by Mr. Pattison is pretty clear. Indeed, the case was brought very graphically to the attention of the House today by the hon. Gentleman. It is difficult not to sympathise with someone in that situation. What concerned me most, however, was the withholding of information by Interpol which purported to relate to what was, in essence, a civil debt. I might have had some sympathy for Interpol if Mr. Pattison was alleged to have been involved in criminal activity in some way, but I must ask why on earth Interpol is holding information about people's civil debts. Surely all Members have experience of constituency cases in which people have fallen into dispute over the payment of a debt in the course of normal business activity. There can be any number of reasons why that could happen, but surely Interpol has better things to do with its time and resources than to hold and disseminate information of that sort.

I understand that the alleged debt, which, as the hon. Gentleman explained, was disputed and is now accepted to have neither truth nor substance, was about £6,000, or $10,000. Why on earth does Interpol have to hold such information, and what possible interest can member states have in sharing it for the sake of security?

The Daily Telegraph also highlighted the case of Marie Casafina. I do not want to go into the details of her case, but what was significant was the comment made by Richard Morris of the consular directorate of the FCO and reported in that newspaper on 22 May. He said:

> "The process of shackling and manacling by US immigration authorities prior to a person's deportation is, I am afraid, routine.
> We raise these cases at all levels with the Americans, asking that their immigration authorities adopt softer detention methods with British nationals."

The FCO should, quite properly, pursue this matter as vigorously as possible. Although my own experience of dealing with the criminal justice system in the United States is very small, it led me to realise that there is a culture there that accepts manacling and shackling in a way that I, as someone who made his living in the criminal justice system as a solicitor, find bemusing and barbaric. It is not for us to try to change the culture in America, but it is legitimate for us to ask that our citizens be treated with the concern and respect that they would be entitled to expect in this country.

The experiences that have been related to the Chamber today should give us a small amount of satisfaction that officers of our own immigration and nationality directorate, although certainly not blameless, have, in my experience as a constituency Member, shown flexibility and compassion. That experience may not have been shared by all, but their behaviour certainly compares very favourably with that of US immigration officials about which we have heard today.

Another concern relates to the holding of information by Governments, which is greater post-11 September that it has ever been. Information is not only held by Governments, but shared between them. The accountability of organisations such as Interpol must be given serious consideration. If Mr. Pattison's case highlights anything, it highlights for us all the fallibility of Governments in gathering, holding and sharing information.

That is one reason that my party and I believe that Government plans for the introduction of identity tags are dangerous in the extreme and should be approached with the greatest caution.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing this important debate. He has a reputation in the House as a tireless worker on behalf of his constituents; we have seen more evidence of that today in the way that he has pursued the case and in his not being prepared to let it go. I also commend the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) for raising another important case. I hope that we get some answers from the Minister on both cases—and some action.

I found the treatment of Mr. and Mrs. Pattison absolutely appalling and unacceptable. I feel for them, and I hope that today's debate shows them that we are on their side. What happened to them is unfair; it should not have happened and it must be put right. I am disappointed to learn about the wide use of shackles and manacles by US officials. I am also disappointed to learn about the role of the British consulate in America and its non-assistance in both cases. It has been suggested that that policy may now have changed. I hope that the Minister will have something to say about that. When British citizens travel abroad, they are entitled to expect more support from consular officials.

Although we have a close working relationship with the USA, I am concerned that representations from the Government do not seem to have achieved much in obtaining justice for those who have suffered. I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk for fighting so hard on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Pattison. I hope that the Minister makes an appropriate response to the debate.

As my hon. Friend stated, it is important to put the Americans' reaction in context. We recognise and understand that 9/11 changed their world. It was the first time since Pearl harbour that the world's only superpower had experienced an attack on its mainland. It is no wonder that the country reacted in such a way and declared war on terror. If we are fully to understand world events, we must not underestimate the true impact of that frightful moment on the corporate psyche of the most powerful nation in the world.

When the twin towers came down, they brought with them an appalling loss of innocent life. It subsequently transpired that it was caused by hijackers, some of whom had entered the United States using various ports of entry. It is no wonder that the country has responded so vigorously by putting up defensive shields and trying to stop foreigners entering the country if it is suspected that they are entering America to commit terrorist acts. We understand America's new determination to secure the country; the American Government, like all Governments, have a primary duty to protect the country's citizens.

We understand also that America needed to fix shortcomings at some of its border controls. America, a country that the hon. Member for Dundee, East described as at the cutting edge of technology, has for a number of years used low-grade technology in some of its border control systems, which often used to cause mistakes. No wonder it is trying to correct that.

Although I understand those reasons, it is none the less perfectly legitimate for us to question some of the measures that have been taken, and to question whether the treatment suffered by innocent visitors to the United States is justified in every case. In a world of great mobility and liberal global markets, it is vital that every nation, especially one as powerful as the USA, strikes the right balance between robust security and allowing access to its markets for business people, tourists and legitimate visitors. The USA needs friends—in its own country and around the world—and the treatment of tourists in America has further alienated public opinion at a time when such alienation is not needed.

The relationship between Britain and the United States has rarely been closer. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk said, the Conservative party treasures the special relationship; I believe in it passionately. We are close allies, and we are co-operating in the struggle against terrorism. That is right and proper. The Home Office and the Department of Homeland Security share enormous quantities of information in their joint enterprise to detect terrorists and prevent them from launching attacks. We understand and support that.

However, although we have a special relationship, which we treasure, friendships and relationships work both ways. This must be a two-way street. If we are co-operating so closely with the United States, as we should be, we are entitled to expect a greater response from the Americans, particularly when cases are raised with them at a high level by Foreign Office Ministers. I should like to know why better channels of communication are not in place between the Foreign Office and its US counterparts and why there is not more of a two-way street in dealing with cases that are raised properly by Members of Parliament.

We remain concerned at the indiscriminate and bureaucratic way in which some rules of entry to the United States have been applied. My hon. Friend raised a case involving a constituent in which US immigration officials clearly overstepped the mark. The hon. Member for Dundee, East raised another case. Scanning some of the press cuttings about this situation in recent weeks and even in the last few days, one can see that there are many other cases.

Those travelling without a visa when an immigration officer deems that one is needed are at risk of being incarcerated and sent home on the first available flight. That is what happened to Mrs. Mordente and, as we have heard, when US officials incarcerate someone, they do not mess around. Some people have complained that they were shackled to the floor during questioning. Why is it necessary in this day and age to shackle or manacle people? Such action is completely disproportionate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk said, Robert Bonner, the US Commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, has admitted that some treatment of British visitors has been "grossly disproportionate".

Last year, two Britons who were frequent travellers to the United States were detained for several hours in a detention room at Miami airport. They were questioned for several more hours about why they had visited America five times in a year. Others have had immigration officials delving into their credit card details and telephone numbers. Kevin McKay, a UK citizen, had to go through a six-week process before being allowed to fly to the United States in January 2004, because of speeding tickets that he accumulated in this country eight years ago. Such a response is disproportionate. In applying the anti-terrorism Act, under which travellers have to list any criminal offences that they have committed, US immigration officials have decided to include minor motoring offences. That might prevent me, with two speeding tickets in the last five years, from getting in—but at least I do not wear red socks. There must be a balance.

Under the normal rules, citizens of 27 countries, including the UK, are entitled to enter the United States for business or pleasure for up to 90 days without a visa. Sometimes, however, through no fault of their own—often because they have fallen ill—people are unable to leave within that time. Following 9/11 and until recently, if such people were caught while trying to leave the USA, they were arrested and detained for a number of hours, until they could be found a place on a flight home; generally, they would have missed the flight that they were trying to catch. Since August, the authorities have relaxed that policy. They no longer detain people but simply require them to apply for a visa for future travel to the USA. We welcome that change of policy towards travellers who, for entirely innocent reasons, may have overstayed their 90-day residence period in the United States.

I shall, however, raise one other specific concern. In 1952, at the height of the cold war, which my hon. Friend remembers well, the United States created a separate classification of visa, called type I, for journalists, who were no longer allowed to travel as normal business people. When the hysteria of the 1950s died down, the immigration authorities stopped applying that rule, and journalists—most of whom, I think, are normal people—travelled under the same conditions as other business travellers. They made the same use of visa waiver programmes as the rest of us.

Since 9/11, however, officials have reactivated the type I requirement, although they have not publicised the fact. Journalists now have to apply for a visa, and that process is no longer easy. They have to pay a fee of £60, dial a premium-rate telephone number to arrange a compulsory interview and, if they are from Syria, Iran or North Korea, or if they are male and between 16 and 45, complete a supplementary form listing every country that they have visited in the last 10 years. They may have to wait weeks, if not months, for the application to be processed. As a result, journalists have been detained.

[Mr. Gary Streeter]

A well-known case involved Elena Lappin, a British citizen married to an American, who had previously entered the United States telling officials that she was visiting as a journalist without a visa. At Los Angeles airport last April—Los Angeles seems to come up from time to time in these discussions—she was arrested for not having a type I visa. She was interrogated for four hours, body searched, fingerprinted, photographed, handcuffed and forced to spend the night in a cell in a detention facility in central Los Angeles. We can see from television programmes that that is apparently not a pleasant experience. She spent another day as a detainee at the airport before flying back to London. We have already heard about Ian McEwan's experience of trying to enter the United States.

Is not it odd that a country whose Congress is constitutionally forbidden to abridge freedom of speech should so restrict travel by foreign journalists? A US Congresswoman, Zoe Lofgren, is currently sponsoring a Bill to reclassify journalists as ordinary business people, making them eligible for the visa waiver programme and putting an end to the current shambles. Perhaps the Minister is making representations about that; we should like to hear from him if so.

We are keen to hear from the Minister about all that he has been doing and will do, particularly about the two constituency cases in question. It is worth saying again that I recognise the difficulty of these matters. We must understand the shock caused by 9/11 and we recognise the duty of every nation to defend its borders and citizens, but we live in a globalizing world, and the free movement of people, goods and services plays an important part in the global economy. Although the issues are primarily a matter for the US Government, given the strength of our relationship with the USA and the impact of the policies on UK citizens, we are entitled to expect that our Government will be active and robust in dealing with these concerns.

It would be good to receive answers from the Minister to the questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk and the hon. Member for Dundee, East have put to him today. I hope that he will intervene more effectively in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Pattison. They are entitled to an explanation from the US Government and from Interpol. They are also entitled to an apology and to closure.

I hope that the Minister will also intervene more effectively in the case of Mrs. Mordente. It seems to me that she should be able to visit her grandchildren in the United States and obtain a visa from the US authorities. What will the Minister do to establish better channels of communication with his US counterparts? Will he make the most robust representations to help the US Government to get the balance right, to make more friends around the world and to treat UK citizens more fairly?

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate, and on the measured way in which he and other hon. Members made their points.

One reflection needs to be made before I go on with the main part of my speech: we all, as constituency MPs, deal with distressing cases of British citizens who find that they cannot secure easy entry into the UK for relatives—spouses, cousins, brothers, uncles and aunts—because of our fairly strict immigration controls. I expect that we might take it amiss if a foreign Government, through their Parliament or Ministers, criticised our immigration controls, the measures that we had decided were necessary to control people's means of entering this country.

Many hon. Members have rightly praised our long-standing and close relationship with the United States, and I think that I am safe in saying that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk is a staunch supporter of the transatlantic alliance. Hon. Members are right to raise individual constituency cases, but we should not let the debate become a generalised criticism of America, for we should not be comfortable if other countries criticised our mechanisms because their citizens were not given swift access to the UK or were turned back at points of entry.

The individual cases raised are of deep concern to the Government. I would be happy if an American reporter were sitting in the Chamber, reporting the debate for The New York Times or the Washington Post. As a former president of the National Union of Journalists, I am delighted that an American Congresswoman is promoting a Bill declaring that journalists are human beings and should be allowed to travel freely.

However, we must set these cases in the context of the great concern that the United States has felt since 9/11. It was not analogous to the attack on Pearl harbour: it was far worse in terms of loss of life, and the attack did not take place on an island possession thousands of miles from the American coastline but was at the heart of the United States. It was an act of aggression by what Joschka Fischer described yesterday, at a lecture that I heard him give at the London School of Economics, as those promoting the new totalitarianism of jihadi terrorism. We must have regard not only to the extraordinary new sensitivity in the United States after that single act of aggression perpetrated by people who were able to enter America because of lax immigration controls, but to the necessity of forging a permanent alliance along many fronts with the United States and the democracies of the world against what Joschka Fischer rightly calls new totalitarianism.

In the case of Mr. Pattison, which I shall return to, there may have been a distinct and separate problem with Interpol. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) raised the question whether allegations involving a relatively small sum—it is good to hear a Scottish Member describe £6,000 as a small sum—should feature permanently on Interpol computers. Like the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), I have three points on my driving licence for a speeding fine, and it is frightening to think that that could prevent me from travelling around the world.

The United Kingdom enjoys a particularly close relationship with the United States. Bilateral relations are generally excellent and we are able to speak frankly to the US Administration whenever a problem such as that raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk arises. He asked me how many complaints we have received from British nationals about problems entering the United States since 9/11, and the answer is that we have had 30 since June 2003. We have not received many complaints about physical and verbal abuse, but I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman a written reply to his question and place it in the Library of the House so that hon. Members are aware of it. Like other hon. Members, I congratulate those newspapers that have drawn attention to the problem.

I find the idea of manacling and shackling citizens of a country in alliance with the United States in Iraq and NATO wholly unacceptable. Were we to do that to any American citizen whom we decided to deport for whatever reason, there would be an absolute outcry. I hope that there would, because the idea of shackling and manacling anyone accused of anything but the most grievous or heinous crimes or acts of terrorism is wholly unacceptable, and I am happy to place that on the record on behalf of the Government.

The US Department of Homeland Security, which oversees immigration matters, has implemented tough, enhanced immigration policies. Those measures extend to all those who travel to the United States and affect all nationalities including British citizens. Immigration procedures are a matter for individual countries. We have no locus to intervene in the immigration affairs of other countries, just as I would not accept foreign interference in our immigration procedures. It is for the US authorities to decide whom they admit to their country. However, the Government have, of course, a duty to take an interest when cases of unacceptable treatment of our nationals by foreign immigration authorities are brought to our attention.

Some 3.8 million British nationals visit the United States every year. Most of them travel on the US visa waiver programme, which allows nationals of certain countries to travel visa-free to the USA for private or business visits of 90 days or less. The vast majority pass through US immigration without trouble. However, over the past 18 months or so, we have received complaints from a small but significant number of British nationals—about 30 since June last year, as I said—who have been subjected to sometimes aggressive treatment, including manacling and shackling, by US immigration officials.

Most complainants had committed relatively minor US visa infringements. The manner in which they had been treated seemed to bear little relation to the so-called errors that they had committed. We have raised individual complaints with the US authorities and encouraged complainants to write to the US embassy and the Department of Homeland Security. The US authorities have apologised for the handling of some cases, but not for their detention policy as a whole. That is why the Government decided that we should take direct action, at senior level, with the US authorities.

In early July, the Minister with responsibility for consular matters, my right hon. Friend Baroness Symons, summoned the chargé d'affaires at the US embassy to the Foreign Office to highlight our concerns about the treatment of our nationals at US ports of entry. Obliging a foreign ambassador or his representative to come to the Foreign Office is a serious statement under the normal terms of diplomatic protocol. I stress that to underline our concern about what is happening to UK nationals going to the United States.

Baroness Symons spoke at length about the problem in general and about individual cases. She said that the matter was of great concern to the Government and asked that the United States take action to improve the manner in which our nationals were treated at US ports of entry when there was a question about their immigration status, and the conditions in which they were held in the event that they were detained. The chargé d'affaires undertook to convey our concerns to the relevant US authorities.

In late August, my right hon. Friend received a letter from the US embassy referring to the action that the US authorities had taken since her meeting with the chargé d'affaires. Our concerns had been investigated personally by Robert Bonner, the Commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, whose bureau has 35,000 employees and is part of the Department of Homeland Security. The DHS undertook to implement measures to improve conditions for what it called "immigration violators", those who are guilty of minor US visa infractions.

Those measures include the granting of greater discretion at ports of entry, to allow the admission of individuals who do not pose a terrorist or criminal threat to the United States. I only hope that a case such as that of Mrs. Mordente, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke), could not happen again if sensible discretion were exercised by officials at ports of entry who were confronted with a granny who had stayed in the United States for 13 days longer than she should have done to be with her family.

In addition, three things have been established. The first is a unit to evaluate decisions made by officials on the ground at ports of entry. People responsible for apparently inappropriate decisions or behaviour will be held accountable and required to justify their actions. The second is a working group to tackle issues of courtesy and to institute a training programme for all employees on maintaining professional and courteous standards while enforcing the law. The third is a system whereby each complaint will be tracked and reviewed at national level to ensure that appropriate action is taken.

I hope that those changes will directly affect the vast majority of the British nationals who, on arrival at US ports and airports, are considered by the authorities to be immigration violators. However, it is not just British nationals who will benefit; the measures will apply to citizens of all nations who travel to the US under its visa waiver programme. The new US detention measures will not affect those who are detained for reasons such as terrorism, criminal activity or possible illegal immigration.

During a visit to the UK in late September, Robert Bonner told journalists that his bureau had received complaints from all over the world about US immigration methods, but he was particularly struck by the number from the UK. He added that the reputation of the United States would be at stake if changes were not made to improve detention and deportation methods for visitors and to give his officers discretionary powers to allow entry to visitors who had committed only minor visa violations. I have sometimes described the United States as the world's greatest self-correcting democracy, and I hope that the points raised by hon. Members, which are being taken very seriously by Baroness Symons, have been put forcefully to the US authorities and will have some impact.

I do want to go into great personal detail about the case of Mr. and Mrs. Pattison, which the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk raised. There is clearly a problem as regards Interpol and the Government of Qatar, and we have received no documentation of any sort from the authorities in Qatar to clarify their position on the matter. I shall ask officials to write to the Qatari embassy in this country for a clear and definitive statement of their position on Mr. Pattison and for clarification whether any documentation relating to his case has been sent to Interpol.

Hon. Members must forgive me if I sound as though I am passing the ball to another Department, but, technically, relationships with Interpol fall under the aegis of the Home Office and, in particular, the National Criminal Intelligence Service. I assure the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk and the House that I shall write personally to Mr. David Lock, the chairman of NCIS and a former colleague of ours. I shall send him a copy of the Hansard report of this debate and ask him to communicate directly with Interpol so that we can find out what is going on. If it would be helpful, I shall also ask him to meet Mr. Pattison. Once we have all the documents and facts in front of us, we can then at least seek to clear up that part of the problem.

I hope that hon. Members accept that the Government have been active, and successfully so, in improving the detention conditions for British nationals who have travelled to the United States on the visa waiver programme. Indeed, in achieving better treatment for our own citizens and making the robust interventions that I have reported to hon. Members, we have succeeded in achieving the same for nationals of other countries.

I am also happy to write to the National Union of Journalists and the International Federation of Journalists to seek their views on the new I visa, which the hon. Member for South-West Devon raised on behalf of the Opposition. Our US colleagues have indicated that our efforts have brought about much-needed change in that regard. We are pleased about that, but we are not complacent. We shall carefully monitor the implementation of the new US measures, and we shall not hesitate to raise with the US Administration any problems that we observe or which are reported to us.

Mr. Keith Simpson: I welcome the Minister's broad comments and thank him for offering to use his good offices with Interpol. I seek his advice on the case of my constituent and that raised by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke). I accept that the Foreign Office can intervene and advise the American Government of its dissatisfaction, although it cannot tell them what to do, but how can I obtain from the American Government some recognition of the fact that my constituent was treated arbitrarily and unfairly, and some assurance that his name will not appear on the Department of Homeland Security computer, which would cause him problems if he ever wanted to return to America or, indeed, visit allied countries? Similarly, speaking on behalf of the hon. Gentleman, how can his constituent receive redress for what is effectively a 10-year bar?

Mr. MacShane: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall ask officials to contact the American embassy over the case of Mrs. Mordente. A Dundee granny who loves America and wants to visit should not have to wait until 2012, and for another two or three American presidents to come to office—although I am sure that we will still have a Labour Government—to see her grandchildren again. However, I stress that the decision must be for the American authorities. On Mr. Pattison, Interpol has told my officials that the warrant is still active, so the problem has to be between Qatar, Mr. Pattison and Interpol. However, I assure the Chamber and the hon. Gentleman that we will do our best for Mr. Pattison.

I make two general points in closing. First, it would be helpful if the travel pages of our newspapers highlighted the necessity for all of us to look carefully at our visas and passports and at the new requirements, particularly for those travelling to the United States.

Throughout British history famous writers have been barred from entering America. For example, Graham Greene was stopped back in the 1950s at the height of the cold war because it was alleged that he had a loose connection with the Communist party. The case of Ian McEwan has been raised, and the case of the singer formerly known as Cat Stevens caused a great fuss here. The Foreign Secretary raised the issue directly with the US Secretary of State, Colin Powell. My message is that we shall vigorously take up all the questions and problems that have been raised. However, there is a duty on us all not only to criticise the United States, but to understand that new rules are in place and to ensure that we comply, just as we expect everyone coming to our country to comply with our rules.

My second point is that we now live in a globalised economy. British business men roam all over the world, rightly, working professionally and getting involved in investments and financial transactions. Sometimes allegations are made, however. I do not refer in any way to Mr. Pattison, but I know of cases involving allegations to do with financial transactions that one party or another does not consider appropriate. Governments can step in on behalf of their nationals and accuse British citizens of improper behaviour over what would be a civil matter rather than a criminal matter, to do with contractual obligations, payments honoured or otherwise, and so on.

Once people's names are on a computer somewhere, it is, I accept, difficult to have them removed. Both as a constituency MP and as a Foreign Office Minister, therefore, I advise people to be purer almost than Caesar's wife. People should be extraordinarily careful not to become involved in any business activity that would not be the norm in UK business, but which they might feel they could get away with because they were dealing with a far-away Government, well beyond the jurisdiction of British courts. I try to put the matter as delicately as possible and I in no way refer to the hon. Gentleman's constituent. However, as a Foreign Office Minister, I find that the issue is one of the most troublesome that I have to deal with.

My message to American journalists is please to report such cases on the front page, to show the concern of the House of Commons about manacling and shackling, and the treatment meted out to the Pattisons, Mrs. Mordente and other British nationals. My message to the editors of travel pages is please to highlight the fact that America is a wonderful place. I love taking my family there on holiday, but new rules are in place and we have to respect them.

My message to the editors of the business pages is to warn business men that a wrongly signed contract, a dishonoured cheque or an investment that is not made according to the rules and with complete transparency that could be defended in a British court, may mean that their names end up on lists that could cause them trouble. Until we have defeated what Joschka Fischer described as the new totalitarianism—the onslaught of organised jihadi terrorists against western values and all countries that are committed to democracy and the rule of law—these problems will continue to plague us. However, I assure the House that the FCO will defend British citizens and be robust with American and other authorities whom we think are not treating them properly. I hope that hon. Members accept that we have obtained some redress from the United States and new ways of operating. I am grateful to hon. Members who have spoken in this important debate.

Military Records Office

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am very grateful to have the opportunity to raise a matter of concern to a great many of my constituents.

The Ministry of Defence records office is based in the constituency of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) who is, in many respects, my hon. Friend. I hope, with your permission, Mr. O'Brien, and that of the Minister, he will be able to take part in the debate. The matter affects our constituents who have raised their concerns about what is going on in the records office. It was sold off to a private company, TNT, which is closing the site in Hayes and transferring all the files to another site in the midlands.

I shall not dwell on the rights and wrongs of privatisation; suffice it to say that saying either that all privatisation is wrong, or that all privatisation is right, is not the way forward. However, in certain areas, privatisation must be done with great care. That is not my point. The records office holds the personal and personnel files of every British sailor, soldier, airman and woman, some of which go back to the first world war, although some were lost in a bombing in 1940. It is not just a highly important historical archive; it is intensely personal for many families.

I have not visited the site myself, although my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington has done so. I have relied on evidence that has been brought to me, and what appears to be going on is nothing short of a national scandal. Hon. Members know from experience, especially in our constituency surgeries, that we sometimes have to take what is said with equanimity, if not a pinch of salt. However, although the people concerned might be said to have an axe to grind because they will eventually lose their jobs, I worked for some years in the private sector and dealt with many members of the public and staff, and I feel that I can detect when people's worries are genuine. That is why I wanted to raise the matter today. It needs to be brought into the open. I am sure that the Minister will try to answer my questions and if he, like me, is not entirely convinced that all is well, I hope that the matter will be looked into as a matter of urgency.

My constituents have come to me in almost the same distress as many people would experience in relation to personal family documents. They have a sense of ownership of the records that comes from working there for many years. It is rather like the sad state of affairs when someone dies and someone else comes in and years of a life are almost thrown away. I get the impression that that is how many of those people feel. One person who wrote to me said:

> "It is horrendous. It has to be seen to be believed."

TNT, the company that took over, apparently stated at the beginning of its tenure that there was no problem with handling the archives—it was no different to handling tins of baked beans. I have spent a good part of my life in the retail sector, and I know that each item of goods has to be handled differently. I do not believe that handling valuable archives should be treated in the same way as a commodity such as baked beans.

[Mr. John Randall]

It seems to me that the company has no experience of archiving or dealing with archives. It has more than 200 agency workers on the site. I have real concerns about the security clearance of some of those workers, and want to be assured that that issue is being handled properly. Some of the material held at the site is of a highly confidential nature and would be covered, if not by the Official Secrets Acts, certainly by the data protection legislation. I understand that the security clearance needed for that type of work would take a considerable amount of time to arrange—one has only to think of the detail required when our staff in the House apply for passes. I would also be interested to know what the charges for such security clearance would be. I get the distinct impression that, at best, some of those measures are not being fully implemented, and I have serious concerns about that.

I have heard that the behaviour of some of the agency staff leaves a lot to be desired. I have heard of towel holders being ripped off the wall in the gents' toilets, of the bin being used as a toilet, and of a roll of paper towels being put in a microwave, which was then switched on and left. Food and drink have been consumed near the files. There have been reports of people fighting, and even playing football within the archive. I know that such things would not have occurred with the quality of staff provided by the MOD.

It has also been reported that two cords on the fire doors have been cut—the doors that would be shut in case of fire. As one can imagine, a fire in an archive is probably the worst disaster that can happen. It is also reported that files are being packed into boxes with the bottoms falling out, and that files are being torn. The reviewers have complained that the files are torn when they receive them. Aircraft board of inquiry files have been separated from the main file, and there will be no chance of marrying them up to the main file once they have been relocated to people who have no experience in that area. In one instance of which I was told, a file relating to the Queen Mother was left lying on a shelf, because an agency worker did not know what to do with it. An ex-MOD worker had to search for hours to find that file, but was told by TNT that they had searched for too long and were being too conscientious.

Many files are kept in caged areas for obvious reasons, and many are for UK eyes only—I believe that that is the designation—but it seems to be quite acceptable for any agency staff to go into those caged areas to pack files for relocation as long as they are accompanied by a member of the TNT staff, who could not possibly keep an eye on the number of people in that area at a given time. Agency staff have been seen reading the files on several occasions.

If only a small number of those reports are true—and I believe that the issue involves more than that—the most distressing aspect is what is happening to individuals servicemen's documents: things are being separated in the move, and things that should be in files are disappearing. With the number of files that we are talking about, the chances of them being put back together in the appropriate files is remote.

As I said, agency staff have been seen reading personnel files. The vast majority of files relate to ordinary men and women of all ranks, and they will be important to their families. However, among those files, are the files of people who became national figures. No doubt, some of their personal details would have financial value, and I am concerned that such files could fall into the wrong hands. There are obvious security questions about people who served in certain parts of the world.

Some of the records have to be transferred by someone personally, with a secret file. They have to go by aeroplane; someone told me that they were put on a 1 pm plane at Heathrow and were expected to be back by about 6 pm. The Ministry of Defence ruling would be that a file of such importance should be picked up by a branch that should have all the necessary paperwork from its office and a secure, locked case in which to carry the file. However, it seems that some of the rules are not being adhered to.

A problem for people who try to trace relatives' files is the increasing number of "no traces"—the self-evident expression meaning that the file cannot be found—that come up. That phenomenon may be extending to the Army Medals Office in Droitwich: there is some evidence that it also increasingly has "no traces" coming back. There is only a certain amount of time that can be allocated to tracing a file before a charge is introduced. The Minister will know much more about that this than I do, but the medals office is being relocated. I worry that once such work is in private hands and charging comes in, there will not be any incentive to get the work done quickly, and that some of the savings that the MOD has introduced to try to cut down expenditure might be wasted if it ends up having to pay a lot more to trace records.

I understand that there is a points system for breaches under the privatisation contract ruling so that the contractor could lose the contract if it loses enough points. Will the Minister tell us about that and whether all the breaches have been investigated?

We will soon be wearing our poppies for Remembrance day. At this moment, in various parts of the world, our servicemen and women are putting their lives on the line for this country. It is for them and in memory of those who served before—not only those who gave their lives, but those who carried on into civilian life with distinction—that we must show respect for this valuable and irreplaceable historic archive. I hope that now that this issue has been highlighted, the Minister will instigate an immediate independent investigation into what is really going on in the MOD records office.

11.10 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I return the compliment to my hon. Friend the. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) by paying tribute to him for securing this debate, and for the support that he has given the staff at the Bourne avenue site, and my constituents.

This is not just a constituency matter, but one of national importance. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister will understand its significance when I say that the records for the Bloody Sunday inquiry were secured at this site. The staff worked intensely hard to ensure that the inquiry received all the information that it required. It is significant not only as a historical archive, but for its relevance to today and today's service people.

I have been dealing with the issue since 2002, when privatisation was first mooted. The issues that we raised in the community and with Ministers concerned security of service, the records themselves, the staff and the future of the site. The tragedy is that I do not think that privatisation would have gone ahead today. Under the new Treasury rules, it would have been below the new £20 million figure for which we would involve ourselves in such privatisations.

We were given assurances at the time of the privatisation proposal. The first was that the service would be maintained at a high quality. Secondly, we were assured that the records would be secure and, thirdly, that the staff would be cared for. We would, as employers, have a duty of care to ensure that they were redeployed and that they had a future that they could depend on.

Today, we have brought forward what can be described as anecdotal evidence of, at times, chaos on the Bourne avenue site—lost records, badly handled files, damaged files, failures of delivery of service and a failure to supervise staff that is putting the site at risk. There is a real risk to the long-term future of this valuable historical archive.

I have tabled parliamentary questions before asking about the number of complaints that have been received. Early this year, we were told that there had been 46 mostly minor complaints. My most recent question received the answer this week that there had been a number of complaints, but that they were only verbal and none had yet been put in writing. The staff should be listened to, because complaints are coming from within the site as well as from other departments.

We need to consider what procedures we need to allow people to come forward straightforwardly and with some protection to establish what is actually happening on the site and what breakdowns in service delivery are happening. I suggest that the Minister considers whether we can establish a whistleblowing procedure on the site and in those departments that are receiving the services of the Bourne avenue site, so that we can have a proper consultation about the reality of service delivery.

Staff working on the site have extreme concerns about the security of the documents. That is permeating into other departments. I tabled parliamentary questions about the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge: that of security clearance for staff. We are told that roughly 180 staff have received security clearance, while another 80 to 100 have received basic clearance. Basic clearance, from my understanding of previous parliamentary questions, involves references being taken up with past employers and perhaps a criminal records check at best. The rules whereby those staff that are security cleared have to supervise basically cleared staff are not being adhered to. Basically cleared staff—they are largely agency staff—are not adequately supervised. In our view, that is putting the security of the site and of the records at risk.

On the site, we have a dedicated loyal staff who have served this country and the Government well. Some of them are with us today, as are their union representatives. They are professional staff, and they have been an excellent example of commitment and service. The promised redeployment to other MOD sites has not occurred. Redeployment to TNT facilities means that the jobs that they have been offered are not of a like kind, so many of them will now lose their employment.

I ask the Minister to meet me, my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge and the trade union representatives to discuss the matter. I also call for an independent investigation, and to allow whistleblowing exercises to take place on the site and within departments so that we can get to the truth of the matter and resolve the threat to that historic archive. Again, I remind the Minister of the significance of that archive to the future of our servicemen.

11.15 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on securing this debate, which is on an important topic, and I recognise the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). Both have monitored the situation closely. I fully recognise their reasons and the interests of their constituents.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who has been dealing with the issue, asks me to apologise for his unavoidable absence. I shall deal with the matter on his behalf.

Like the hon. Member for Uxbridge, I have not visited the facility. However, I am told that it is worth a visit so that one can see the extent of the problems that it faces—not because of the staff issue but because of the inadequate nature of the infrastructure. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has visited the site, but I recommend that he does so. If he undertakes such a visit, some of the other issues that have been mentioned may be raised then.

I emphasise the Government's commitment to modernising and improving public services. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman and my Friend would not disagree with that prerequisite. My Department, like others, seeks to deliver quality services efficiently and effectively. The records services provided at Hayes for a number of Government departments and agencies, and managed by the MOD, is no exception.

In 1997, a study recommended that alternative ways of providing that service should be explored. Again, I would expect the hon. Member for Uxbridge to recognise that one should always look for better ways of doing things. Significant investment would be required to provide a modern and effective archive service, and public and private sector solutions were both fully explored. That resulted in discussions with three consortiums, two of which submitted bids. Although the bids were similar, the TNT and ProLogis bid offered a better quality records service and a lower risk property solution.

The overall objective was to provide the required flexibility and give value for money for the customer departments. The contract therefore provided for the contractor to bear a significant risk, as well as to construct, commission and operate a new facility, to maintain and operate the Hayes archive for an interim period, and then to dispose of the Hayes site for redevelopment.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

The service elements of the contract cover the depositing and storage of records, their retrieval and dispatch, and, when instructed by the department concerned, the destruction of records. A significant enhancement of the previous service is the requirement to produce an electronic index of the file holdings. Given his commercial background, I hope that the hon. Member for Uxbridge recognises the importance of such an approach.

The changes will enable the contractor to track and trace requests for files; it also supports departments when discharging their responsibilities under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, which, as hon. Members will recall, comes fully into force on 1 January next year.

The final negotiations were concluded in September 2003, and the Ministry of Defence awarded the contract to TNT (UK) Ltd., with ProLogis Ltd., on 18 September 2003. The contract provides for TNT (UK) Ltd to take over functions previously carried out by civil service staff at the archive.

I shall touch briefly on how we handled staff matters. The staff were given the option, under a preference exercise, either to transfer to the contractor under arrangements under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, or to remain within Government employment.

When the contract was awarded, a three-month trade union consultation was conducted between TNT and the Public and Commercial Services Union, following a code of practice agreed between the Ministry of Defence, the trade unions and industry. The process was successfully concluded by vesting day, 18 December 2003, when the contract commenced. Forty-seven staff transferred to the new company, and after the award of the contract TNT launched the construction of a new archive building in Swadlincote, south Derbyshire. The facility is far more modern and advanced in design, has better fire protection—the hon. Member for Uxbridge raised that point—is more energy efficient, and is generally far more suitable for its purpose, than the buildings at Hayes

The new building at Swadlincote meets all the requirements of the Cabinet Office manual of protective security, which is not true of the Hayes building. The facility was completed ahead of schedule, on 29 April 2004, with final completion and handover, subject to the usual rectification of minor defects, on 6 October 2004. The facility has a storage capability of 1 million archive boxes, with space for expansion if necessary.

When TNT took over operation of the Hayes site on 18 December 2003, it immediately began the indexing phase of the contract, to create a complete catalogue of the archive holdings. The concept—I hope that the hon. Member for Uxbridge will agree with the approach—is to capture essential information about each of the approximately 12 million items stored at the Hayes site to create an accurate and comprehensive database of the records held. The intention is to enable rapid and accurate location of files for immediate dispatch to the customer when required.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington mentioned one of the big issues that required the accurate recall of, and access to, important files going back many years—the case he mentioned was a major inquiry, but it seems to me that the same should apply to an individual record. My hon. Friend, who has followed the Saville inquiry, will know how some information kept turning up. That was not because of inadequacies on the part of the staff, but because of a less than adequate filing system. That is why we had to try for a fundamental change in practice.

The contract with TNT applies fully the Government's strict and robust security standards, extending to the physical environment, delivery services, IT systems and personnel. The hon. Member for Uxbridge raised a concern about the security vetting of the agency staff at the facility.

John McDonnell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: I will give way if I have time towards the end; I should rather cover all the points that have been raised, if possible. There may be time for interventions.

As to security clearance, TNT personnel, all agency staff and permanent staff employed by TNT at Hayes and Swadlincote are subject to security checks and clearances in accordance with Government policy. Those security clearances are granted on the basis of the same criteria and standards that apply to civil servants employed on similar work.

The Defence Vetting Agency has made significant improvements over the past few years, and the clearances are being processed smoothly, but not, as has been suggested, on a preferential basis. Although the matter was not raised in the debate, I am aware of comments about the private company being given preference over civil servants who wanted clearance, but that was not the case. All staff are vetted to basic or security level.

The hon. Member for Uxbridge raised the matter of people going into secure areas. I hear what he says, but I am advised that TNT allows only appropriate staff to see UK-eyes-only files. He also raised the issue of the reading of files. It seems to me that, as an indexing process is being undertaken, it may be necessary to open a file to identify what is in it, and, we hope, establish a correlation between the index name and the file content. It would not surprise me that files had been read. However, I should hardly think that all the millions of files involved would have been read.

Mr. Randall: It is important to distinguish between looking at something and reading it.

Mr. Ingram: I am not going to get into a long debate on this, but I return to the Saville inquiry. People would have to read the contents of a document in detail to see whether it was relevant to that inquiry. It is not simply a question of looking at the heading. Sometimes the content beneath it might also give a trace elsewhere. The process is not as simple as the hon. Gentleman suggests. I ask him to reflect on that. If something is for indexing, it is better to give the best index. If it is for retrieval and examination, it should be done authoritatively and, I hope, exhaustively, depending on the nature of the inquiry.

All the Government records stored at the Hayes site have been retained either to meet a continuing business need or to discharge the obligations of departments under the Public Records Acts to preserve important documents. TNT is fully aware of the requirement properly to handle and protect all the Ministry of Defence material and other material now in its charge. To provide additional assurance that the contractual requirements are being met, the MOD has set up a contract management team to work alongside TNT to assist in the transition of activity to TNT and from Hayes to Swadlincote and to undertake audits and reviews. That might go some way towards addressing the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington. If he is demanding more, the matter might be worthy of examination by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, but that is the sort of audit and review mechanism that we have put in place.

The team remains based mainly at Hayes, but it has begun a relocation that will make it more convenient to oversee activity at Swadlincote.

Let me deal with TNT's performance in running the archive. The contract includes a comprehensive performance measurement specification, which specifies two time targets for each category of records retrieval. Most retrievals must meet the earlier target, and almost all the remainder must meet the longer one. The required level of achievement against the more challenging time target increases as the months elapse after vesting day, which reflects the expectation that TNT's performance should improve.

I am advised that TNT has to date consistently fulfilled those targets for records retrieval. It is, however, keen to exceed those requirements—again, because we all recognise the importance of these records—and it has been working with the contract management team to investigate areas where performance could be improved.

Unfortunately, teething problems are likely to arise in a contract of this size and complexity. As the hon. Member for Uxbridge will know from his commercial background, not everything goes swimmingly when one is moving from one large operation to another and transferring several lines on to a new computerised system, as in this case.

The contract management team is working with TNT to address these issues, which I am confident will be resolved because, again, we all recognise the important of these records. I agree that it would be worth comparing TNT's performance with the achievement before the contract was let. That would be a good thing to do, but it is simply not possible. The in-house team was not managed in the same, outcome-focused way, and it did not keep comparable performance statistics, so we had no baseline against which to assess it. That does not mean that we will not have new baselines for the new contract company.

Let me pay tribute to the dedication of the civil servants who operated the archive for many years in less than ideal conditions. That is why I suggest that a visit to the site might open eyes. In the past nine months, TNT has indexed more than 6 million records and has started to create the database to which I referred.

Before I make other points, I assure hon. Members that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will read what has been said in this debate. I shall speak to him, but the reform will be a matter for him. He views the process with the greatest seriousness, and we must ensure that what we are putting in place is as good as, or perhaps even better than, what went before.

John McDonnell: May I emphasise the importance of meeting members of staff to discuss this critical matter, as the contract management system is obviously not working, and we need to investigate this matter in detail and independently?

Mr. Ingram: I am taking note of the concerns—

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

British Council (Africa)

2 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I am delighted to stand here this afternoon, and I must declare an interest right away. This year, I have been immensely fortunate. I joined a scheme managed by the British Council in the UK to twin women Members of Parliament here with women MPs in parts of Africa, and I was fortunate enough to go to Zambia. First, a marvellous woman MP from Zambia, Mrs. Rosemary Chipambe, who represents the community of Nchelenge, spent a week with me, supported by the council, and then I went to see her.

I am also delighted that the director general of the British Council in Zambia could be here today. That is an extraordinary coincidence. As hon. Members will know, applying for a debate in Westminster Hall does not necessarily mean that one will secure a debate here. I told the director general that I intended to apply for a debate when I got home, and I was immensely fortunate in being allocated one the following week. I doubt whether that has happened to many hon. Members, but it is a marvellous set of circumstances and coincidences. I apologise to all those who applied for debates and did not secure them, but at least we are here now to acknowledge the work that the British Council does in Africa.

It is unfortunate but true that most of us hear about Africa only when there is a problem. The difficulties faced by the continent are well known: poverty, lack of access to education and health facilities, HIV/AIDS, the thin skills base, difficulties with the democratic processes, which have not yet been embedded so as to provide equal opportunity and a guide against corruption, and poor leadership. However, that is not the whole story, and I shall use the debate to bring into focus a continent that all hon. Members need to understand better and engage with if we are to have a fair and prosperous world and communities that contribute rather than take from others.

From what I have seen of Africa, I know that it is possible to make a positive difference there, but to do so we must change the nature of our engagement with the people of the continent. We must move from talking to listening and from showing to sharing. I certainly support such a move after my recent trip.

The United Kingdom has had a long and multi-faceted relationship with Africa. It is complicated by a legacy of colonial resentment aggravated by present-day disputes over trade, for example, and the war on terror. It is important to understand that in both the UK and Africa, a generation has grown up that has no direct experience of colonialism, but whereas in this country colonialism is something in history books, many people in Africa, including many young people, still feel that they are living out its consequences.

For almost 70 years, the British Council has been one of the UK's main channels for its engagement with Africa. The first group of student English teachers from west Africa came here to study under British Council auspices in 1936. In the same year, the council sent a British arts exhibition to Johannesburg. Its role in supporting the development of civil society, including those associated with the African National Congress, in the late 1980s and early 1990s—the dying years of apartheid in South Africa—helped to provide a strong base for high-level relations in today's era of majority rule. That was recognised by Kader Asmal, South Africa's Minister of Education, who said recently that the British Council continued to play a crucial role in South Africa in supporting its transformation agenda, particularly in the niche areas of education, the arts and culture.

Over that time, the British Council has become a familiar presence on much of the African scene. Today, many Africans, from many different walks of life, have had experience of the UK through the council. One of them, Tejan Kabbah, who lived in the British Council's Hans Crescent hostel when he was a student in London, is now President of Sierra Leone. I met Tejan last year when I went to Sierra Leone. He had only glowing words of praise for the British Council. We have to be immensely proud of an organisation that, through its assistance and support, sees today one of its former luminaries, as it were, as President of Sierra Leone.

In Ghana, President Kufuor also speaks of his student days in the British Council library in Kumasi. Opening the council's new IT-based knowledge and learning centre in Accra earlier this year, he contrasted today's high-tech facilities and its pioneering access for Ghanaians with the World Bank's global distance learning network, saying,

> "The services of the British Council provide a vital backdrop to strengthening the formal diplomatic and bilateral relations between our two countries".

The experience of the British Council in Africa—it would be well for all of us to listen to what it has to say—is that given a mixed history of mixed access to opportunities, there is a suspicion of western motives across the continent. If we in this country want to engage with Africans we need to work with them in ways that they believe are of benefit to them, not just to us—practical help rather than patronage.

From what I have seen of the British Council's work, that is what I believe we are doing. We are not patronising; we are desperately trying to help and engage communities about which we care and feel passionately. I welcome the active role that the British Council is playing to ensure that its approach is tailored to the principles of the NEPAD—New Partnership for Africa's Development—initiative, which seeks firmly to ensure that ownership lies with the Africans themselves. I was also pleased to see that the council is working with the Commission for Africa and has attached a senior member of staff to work inside the commission. That is a fantastic initiative from our Prime Minister that needs to be applauded.

Today the British Council is represented in 19 countries across sub-Saharan Africa and manages a turnover of almost £18 million. Given that the British Council programme reaches tens of thousands of Africans, that strikes me as good value for money. When we factor in the wider reach that the British Council is achieving through the cascading of its work through change agents, we see that it is clear that it is having a wider and deeper impact than the sums of money would suggest. Let us take, for example, the numbers reached through partnership of education reform or English language capacity building, which is a particular forte—a jewel in our crown—for the British Council in Zambia.

It is clear that the prospects of many millions of people have been improved by the British Council's work. It is also having an impact through new and imaginative approaches. It has a syndicated music programme called "Selector", broadcasting the best of contemporary British music to audiences of hundreds of thousands of Africans every week, making the return on the investment even greater.

I wish to take a few moments to tell hon. Members an anecdote. I visited the community of Nchelenge, which has nothing: no water or electricity. It is a very poor community of 130,000 people in north-west Africa. There is a hospital of sorts run by a missionary of nuns. When they asked me for a meal I was delighted to go, because the accommodation in Nchelenge is challenging by our standards. I got used to the cockroaches; it was the rats that got to me. When the nuns offered me a nice meal in the missionary I took up their offer, only to arrive to find them watching BBC News 24 on their satellite television. They told me that it was the best programme that they watched, and that they did so everyday. At the time, the service was broadcasting the latest antics of Roy Keane, and they talked about him as if they knew him intimately and well. I was thunderstruck that 700 miles along the road from Lusaka, where there was no transport or anything else, the BBC was reaching out to a community of people in deepest Africa. They were thrilled with the presentation. The intimacy of BBC News 24 was brought to me on that occasion.

As well as networking and bringing together people through the education programme, the British Council is also responsible for a programme that seeks not only to develop and bring on young leaders within their country, but to link them with their peers throughout Africa. The programme, which is called Interaction, also puts them in touch with people in this country, sometimes through face-to-face meetings, but its major feature is a cutting-edge website that allows them to stay in touch remotely—a facility that also gives them access to the knowledge stored in hundreds of specialist journals. The British Council uses Interaction to provide leadership training to 1,500 young African leaders, each of whom will be inspired to change the lives of thousands or perhaps millions of people. Let us hope that they do so.

Hon. Members may be surprised to hear that web-based technologies are appropriate for Africa, but that is the new reality of the continent, and the British Council is increasing its investment in electronic services. That will extend the organisation's traditional role as the provider of information through libraries. In the near future, those services will be available not only through British Council offices in capital cities, but through a growing network of cyber cafés in some of the remotest parts of Africa. Let us hope that a cyber café gets to that hospital in Nchelenge.

I do not want to create the impression that it is all plain sailing. If there are to be improvements in political accountability, democratic participation and human rights, Africans and those working with them need to address some pervasive and highly sensitive issues. In Africa, there is a lot to be critical about, but sometimes tackling the issues head on only puts people's backs up, especially among those who are well aware of the shortcomings of the human rights record of European powers in Africa.

The British Council has found a creative solution to tackling the issue of holding the powerful to account through an exhibition of political graphics from the UK called "Upfront and Personal", which toured southern Africa earlier this year. It was well received in South Africa, where there is a culture of brash, in-your-face political advocacy, but the situation in Botswana and Mozambique is very different. I understand that there was some nervousness about how such a forthright challenge to the establishment would be received.

The exhibition worked in those countries because the establishment had to be challenged. It was a challenge to show how graphic illustrators, designers and cartoonists have attempted to keep the mighty on their toes in this country. We invited people in South Africa to think about how they handled freedom of expression in their own societies. At the opening of the exhibition in Gaborone, the Minister of Communications, Science and Technology asked whether Botswana was ready for such an exhibition. He was immediately answered his own question by saying, "Hell, yes. Let's go for it."

The ways in which the British Council is working in partnership with Africa include "Dreams and teams", an international programme aimed at developing young leaders through sport. It was launched in 2001 and now operates in 20 countries worldwide, including seven in Africa. Young people, teachers and youth leaders in the UK and Africa are trained to organise inclusive sports festivals and join a school link project. They learn by doing—in teamwork, communication and inclusion. The shared language of sport is an easy way into cultural exchange, enabling mutual learning between north and south.

The British Council is developing sport as a tool for education in Africa, and it aims to pilot sports programmes in schools this year, with "Dreams and teams" forming a key component of the life-skills training syllabus. As to school links, the Department for International Development has a marvellous programme called the global schools partnership, a consortium initiative between Cambridge Education Foundation and Voluntary Service Overseas that promotes sustainable partnerships between Africa and UK schools; for example, a school in Malawi is partnered with a school in Norfolk. That link has facilitated reciprocal visits and joint curriculum work, but I know, especially through the churches in the UK and their work with the British Council, that there are huge numbers of informal linkages between schools in Britain and schools in Africa. They are immensely rewarding experiences for teachers and pupils here and in Africa.

I said that we needed to talk to Africans; when we do, they tell us that what they want are our voices. Rosemary Chipambe, my counterpart MP in Zambia said to me, "We both have a voice and we can both utter the same words, Claire, but your words will be heard much louder than mine." We must try to reach a point in our global history when all people's voices carry equal weight and when all people are heard equally by those who influence their lives.

My experience of the British Council in Zambia was extraordinarily good, and I would encourage any Member of Parliament who has not approached the British Council about undertaking an exchange visit to do so. Our representatives in such countries are outstanding. Last year, on a visit to Sierra Leone, I met the head of the British Council there. He had a most difficult job and was dealing with a very brutalised society. He did extraordinarily well and has broken down huge numbers of barriers between himself and the administrative authorities. The British Army is still there, doing a magnificent job. The head of the British Council was on a single secondment, so he had left his family behind in the UK—he was a man of remarkable dedication. Apart from doing all the things that I love, such as promoting science, engineering and education, he did a fantastic amount to help with the development of culture in Sierra Leone.

When I went to Zambia a couple of weeks ago, I was met by John Mitchell, the director of the British Council there. He came to meet me personally and took me to his home; it was a wonderful welcome. The British Council is clearly well networked through John, who knows everyone and anyone, including members of the Government. There is a real emphasis on working together to enable the Africans to achieve not our objectives, but theirs. British resources are being put at the disposal of wonderful people who need them to achieve their potential.

The British Council works not only with other bureaucratic administrations, but with the voluntary sector and non-governmental organisations, which are numerous throughout Africa. The task faced by British Council officers such as John Mitchell is to reach out to all those agencies to maximise the benefits that we deliver in such nations.

John has to administer several grant programmes, including the Chevening awards. I told him that the funding for the awards had been reduced and that I was sorry about that because they produced fantastic returns. We get huge benefits for very little money, and I would ask colleagues in DFID and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to look again at the awards. They are made in a number of categories, but those chosen this year do not include engineering. As colleagues will know, I am a chartered engineer by profession, and I am desperately concerned about the absence of engineering as a discrete category. Africa can receive a huge amount of investment, and people want to invest and do well there, but unless there is an indigenous population of technicians and engineers, all the investment will be wasted. A huge $10 million water installation could be built in the Nchelenge community, for example, but the company that I spoke to said that it would not build the installation unless there was a community of Africans who could manage it. It is desperately important to increase the number of engineers in Africa, because engineers build the beautiful, clean and safe communities that people need.

To conclude, the British Council's work in Africa is extraordinary, and I am grateful to have had the opportunity publicly to applaud it. I hope that the Government continue to support the British Council and people such as John Mitchell.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): My hon. Friend has given an impressive catalogue of the British Council's activities. Does she agree that one of its great characteristics is that it is very well networked and therefore able to take on issues that can be difficult in some African states? I was recently lucky enough to go on an exchange visit of the kind that she has just been on and which triggered this debate. The British Council asked me to go to Ethiopia to teach the judiciary how to deal with domestic violence cases. That is a very difficult thing to do. For one thing, the British cannot go there and pretend for one minute to have all the answers. For another, one had to contend with a very old-fashioned attitude among the judiciary, which was buttressed by a pretty out-of-date constitution. The position has now changed, but the constitution originally gave a man the right to a defence if he struck his wife because she did not obey him. Persuading judges that they should look at the new constitution as it grew and that its equality clauses had to override that old law was a very diplomatic job, from which the British Council did not shrink—

Mr. Bill O'Brien (in the Chair): Order. Interventions must be brief.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I fully understand the point that my hon. and learned Friend makes.

When I was in Sierra Leone, the British Army was there trying to bring order through training the army. The British Government involvement in the reconstruction of Sierra Leone also means that we are substantially supporting its law courts and law network, and the police service and the training of the police. Support for those institutions is essential in trying to ensure that a country is brought back to the point of having a judiciary that acts both in a way that is not corrupt and in the best interests of the people whom it serves. That is an immensely challenging task, as the problem is all over Africa.

I am very concerned, as the vast majority of women throughout the world would be, about the level of female genital mutilation that occurs in Africa. Tackling that is—

Mr. Bill O'Brien (in the Chair): Order. May I ask the hon. Lady to address the Chair, please?

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I have difficulty looking both ways, Mr. O'Brien, and I do not want to miss hon. Members who might want to intervene, but I would not wish to insult you for one moment.

I think, however, that I have brought my remarks to a close.

2.21 pm

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) not only on securing the debate, which I think is the first on the subject in this Session, but on her enthusiasm for and dedication to the British Council. I also congratulate her on the way in which she has participated in the exchange with other women MPs, some of whom are present.

I congratulate David Green, the director general of the British Council, who was knighted in June this year. That was a wonderful thing—it was well deserved, because he is such a marvellous director general.

Neil Kinnock will become chairman of the council in November, and that will complement David's role. There are exciting times ahead for the British Council.

I chair the all-party British Council group. We will soon be extending the way in which we work in the House by announcing an MPs' ambassador role for the British Council, so that particular MPs' interests, such as the women's movement or equality and justice, will be twinned with a country.

When we started the all-party group seven years ago, I said to David Green that the two things that he should concentrate on were IT for Africa and sport. I think that he thought that I was barking mad. If one travelled to British Council offices across Africa eight years ago, one saw that hardly anyone had computers and no one had servers in their offices. The wonderful thing is that now they have not just one computer but, sometimes, 60 or 120. Where they had one server, now they have two, three or four.

A remarkable change has happened to the British Council—a silent revolution. That means that thousands and thousands of local people in each of the countries in Africa can come to the British Council, can see a paper that has not been restricted by the local government, can catch up with world affairs and can have conversations that they cannot always have in their villages and towns. We need to do more on the IT area, and I shall say more about that later.

In the "Dreams and teams" programme, the soccer has been sensationally successful. We have learned from our experience that it is no good turning up with 25 Nike balls and 25 football shirts, because those will get sold on the black market the day that we leave. We have concentrated on finding local leaders who can run local soccer teams when we have left, and that has been terrifically successful.

The Government can be proud of their record with the British Council. We have had seven years of increases in funding. It is never easy for the British Council, because every time there is a change in the world, it is asked to do more. We asked it to look after all the "stans" in the former Soviet Union—to open more premises there. We have asked it to do more in the middle east, especially since 9/11. Its funds are finite, and it tries its best, but it always wants more. We should be as supportive as we can. If we were to ask it how it views the next seven or eight years, perhaps it would say that we need its presence not in western Europe, but in the middle east and Africa.

The British Council is one of the three great ambassadors for the country in Africa, the other two being the Open university and BBC World Service. People are always surprised when I mention the Open university. I mention it not just because I am a graduate of it, but because it has educated 5 million Africans and is the largest university in Africa. Ethiopia and Eritrea had a 20-year war of attrition, which did no one any good. When Ethiopia eventually took the democratic path, 23 of its 25 Cabinet Ministers took MBAs. The Prime Minister got the third highest MBA ever recorded at the Open university.

We have created things to be proud of—Jennie Lee and Harold Wilson should be smiling in their graves about the extent of the Open university. The BBC World Service keeps getting better. It is good that the British Council has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Open university and the BBC World Service.

This week in the House of Commons is a typical week for the British Council. On Monday, the all-party groups on Zimbabwe and on the British Council met. We heard from David Martin, the British Council's director of central Africa, on the problems of trying to handle Zimbabwe in its current phase. He gave a remarkably poignant and telling speech, and was not shy about taking hard questions from hon. Members.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) hosted a lunch for African literature and what the British Council is doing with Margaret Meyer. This is a difficult time for African literature, and I ask the British Council to reconsider its role.

The two great British publishing houses, Macmillan and Heinemann, which have been consumed by other companies over the past 10 years, no longer publish African literature. The only way in which African literature could come to the notice of the rest of the world was through the two imprimaturs in those two big publishing companies, but that is no longer the case.

I wonder whether the British Council could find a way to create a small publishing house with the Department for International Development and with perhaps a private enterprise such as the Commonwealth Development Corporation, so that we could publish such novels and bring them to the attention of the rest of the world. It is a sad day when books are burned, as they were in Germany in the 1930s, and it is as sad a day when we can find no way to publish talented poets and writers in Africa.

I have been lucky enough to spend time with British Council officials in Egypt, Ethiopia, Malawi, Zambia, Tanzania, Mozambique, Namibia, Botswana, Kenya and Tunisia. Africa is in my skin: I was brought up in Nigeria and I simply cannot get away from it. Generally, the quality of people in our British Council offices is second to none, and they work fantastically well under trying conditions. I ask a small favour. After 16 November, when we will be able formally to start highlighting our bid for the Olympics, we could provide every British Council officer with a tape of the London bid, so that they can act as apostles and fans to help us to win.

I will finish with these three thoughts. First, we could take the Open university idea wider with the Commission for Africa, on which the British Council has a seat. Mbeke's brother—I am trying to remember his Christian name—said in his report for the South African foreign policy think-tank that facilities and education for children in primary schools are now much worse than they were under Britain, France, Germany or Italy. We could have a big idea: Open university for schools. We could call it "free school TV" and put it up in English and 10 to 15 other languages simultaneously via broadband and satellite. We could use solar energy as the source, and use the cheap £50 computer systems that are now available to carry out a primary school revolution for Africa. If there is one thing that the commission could do, it is that. I should welcome the Minister's thoughts on that.

[Mr. Derek Wyatt]

Secondly, every year, 2 billion people try to learn English. It is a lot to ask of the British Council to take care of that, although it raises considerable funds, which it uses well. There is business to be had through BBC Worldwide, the Open university and the British Council in creating a teaching online service for English.

Lastly, a new movement is on its way from America, started by a professor called Lawrence Lessig, of Stanford university. It is called the creative commons. The idea is that, as one uses a small letter "c" for "copyright", one would use two for "creative commons". They would be used to allow copyright to lapse, or to be used. The website has been visited by 1.5 million people to release their copyright in music, art and books that they have written in the past 10 or 15 years, so that we can share.

For example, Gilberto Gil, a fantastic jazz musician in Brazil who is also the Arts Minister in the Brazilian Government, has persuaded the artistic and music community in Brazil to release all their art and music for free use outside Brazil, so that Brazilian music can come to the fore on the radio and online. How wonderful it would be if we could use the creative commons idea to free up copyright and to enable education to happen faster in Africa.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): I am delighted to be able to take part in the debate, as I, too, have been a participant in a British Council exchange programme. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on obtaining this debate and so expertly setting out the picture of the British Council in Africa. I shall not repeat the points that she has covered, but will talk about what happened on my visit. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt), because he has not only shown immense dedication, as a parliamentarian, to the British Council and everything that it stands for, but contributed innovative ideas and suggestions, which I hope may be taken forward.

I was part of the women's exchange that was just called "Big cars and leaking roofs". The MPs have the big cars and the people have the leaking roofs. There is a perception in Africa that all MPs line their own pockets and do not care about their constituents. That was certainly not true of the twinned MP whom I met in Zambia and who visited my constituency, the hon. Rose Banda of Milanzi constituency in the eastern province of Zambia. Her dedication is as deep as that of any Member of this House, but the difficulties that she faces in carrying out her tasks are beyond the imagination of most of us.

I have had the good fortune to travel quite widely, but I had never been, until May 2003, to any of the poorest African countries. I thought that I had known all my life what it would be like in such a place, but, of course, the reality is much starker. The contrast between my constituency, which is one of the poorest in the UK, and Rose's constituency, one of the poorest in Africa, was extraordinary.

First, there are 60,000 registered voters in my constituency. Although, of course, I cannot visit them all, I can visit the whole constituency in a day. It is an inner-city constituency. Rose Banda has a mere 2,000 registered voters, but it takes two weeks to visit all the villages in her constituency.

We spent some of our time in a variety of meetings in Lusaka. One was with women MPs, the women's caucus of the Parliament. The minute we sat down—and I have to say that the meeting was extremely well organised and the majority of women MPs attended, even though the House was not sitting on that day—we found that our experiences as parliamentarians and as candidates were similar, as were our experiences of political parties.

We are the second-class gender in every Parliament and in every political party. There is no question about that. The women had faced the kinds of discriminations and difficulties with which we are all familiar in the west. We have had so much good fortune, and we have made such strides to equal gender representation, particularly in our party, that I was able to offer encouragement. I was able to talk from my experience and say that we might be in a much better position today, but that when I came into the House, there were just 37 women. We have made progress.

The women's caucus has no place to meet in that Parliament. Its members have no women's rooms; they have none of the facilities that we have gained for ourselves. However, we were able to talk about how they could move forward and not be totally discouraged. At that level, meeting with parliamentarians in the Parliament, I felt that I could make a contribution and thanked the British Council, because it had made me feel that I had been of some use there.

The highlight was the visit to the constituency. It takes seven hours to travel from the capital to the border of the constituency, and the border was vital to us, because there was a bed-and-breakfast establishment there. It was quite simple, but it had a hot water supply, a bath, hot food, electricity and mosquito nets over the beds. None of those, I was to find, were available in the constituency.

In that constituency, I saw for the first time people who would engage with me on every topic of conversation that was of interest—about the world, Africa, Zambia, and the UK—and we could have all those conversations, but they had absolutely none of the necessities that I found in the bed and breakfast to which we gratefully returned late each night. There is no electricity in the whole of the province, and no running water. There are none of the things that we now take for granted, particularly in education, such as access to computers or mobile phones.

Everything had to be made by the people themselves. Everything had to be traded or bought by people walking huge distances. It was most poignant to see all the huge plastic carrying cans—a western technology with which we are more than familiar. We have too much plastic; we have a problem disposing of it. There, each can is made to the greatest size possible, which even children have to carry when they are full of water—muddy, dangerous and diseased water from the river. Unless they carry that water daily, they have no means of washing or preparing food, and no water to drink.

Disease was clearly a major factor. One in five Zambians are, I think, infected with HIV/AIDS. In the whole time that I was there and travelling huge distances, we were able to find only one tiny clinic. Let us imagine a clinic that does not have a hot water system, and has no means of sterilisation. It was well stocked with drugs, because the world community, in various guises, was providing drugs. However, the most fundamental matters, such as sufficient room to examine people properly, were lacking—there was only one examination room. All the women who were giving birth needed to travel to that small clinic.

The basic nature of the facilities was so extreme that I could not but marvel at the way in which the people were entirely resilient and optimistic, struggling to achieve. I saw that in the schools, for example. People had gone to the muddy rivers, got the mud, carried it back—mud is jolly heavy—and made bricks. In one place, 1,000 bricks had been dried in the sun and were ready to use to make the walls of a school, or a schoolhouse for a teacher. However, there was no cement and, because of that, the 1,000 bricks would lie on the floor for a couple more years.

I went to schools that had no glass in the windows. Of course, that does not matter in the middle of a hot period. However, if it is teeming with rain or bitterly cold, it matters a great deal. Then, there were the leaky roofs. There were leaky roofs everywhere, and every village needed metal to seal the holes or to replace a roof that had blown off—a frequent occurrence, it seems. I went to a courthouse, a little wooden building with thatching, which had been almost eaten away by termites.

I had always known about people's daily struggle to live, but there is no substitute for seeing something with one's own eyes. I can tell the British Council that that is an incredibly important experience for western politicians to have. However, it is also vital that, having had the experience, we should understand what is needed and be in a position to try to meet those needs.

I went with Rose to visit the British high commissioner and to ask, "Why is the UK not making any funds available to eastern province in Zambia?" He explained quite reasonably that our Government were trying to help the Zambian Government to progress towards greater democracy, accountability and efficiency, province by province. I had to tell him that the need for help is there now. It costs so little—£4—to get a mosquito net to save the lives of newborn babies. It costs very little to equip a simple clinic or to provide a sewing machine so that women can sew cloth and sell it at market. They are prepared to walk to make sales if they can, but they have to have the basic equipment. It costs little to provide hoes for basic agriculture.

I could see all the things that Rose and her people were telling me about. They said, "Help us; we want to work, and we will do all that we can to help ourselves. We will construct our own schools,"—they had already done so in many cases—"We will dig our own latrines. We accept that we are living in a situation in which we will not get electricity or running water tomorrow." At that time, we were not able to help. However, now—I am sure that it has nothing to do with my visit—the UK Government are giving money to the eastern province and Rose's constituents have received promises of £10,000 to assist the organisations that she has worked to set up in her community.

Let me talk about those organisations. They are primarily women's clubs. The women I saw were very organised. Wherever they could, on the tiniest sums of money, they produced the smallest amount of produce that could be sold. I saw them hoeing fields in which they had said that they would grow crops not just for their families but for the whole community, and would use them to obtain money to look after the orphans. Every village has a huge number of orphans because of HIV/AIDS, and the women organise themselves to look after those children, many of whom have no parents or grandparents. The poorest people there are looking after the most disadvantaged in the world.

I saw people not only doing physical things, such as trying to get money and using it for good causes, but engaging in self-education.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.56 pm

On resuming—

Joan Ruddock: I was talking with some enthusiasm about how Zambian women are helping themselves and doing much for their communities.

I want to describe how those women are working in education. Some are teachers, but the women's clubs in the Milanzi constituency are primarily putting on theatre performances and educating whole villages about HIV/AIDS and the things that can happen to young women. I saw a most extraordinary performance, as good as anything that I could have seen in a fringe theatre in London. The message went across to children, young people and adults—both male and female. All sat and watched the performance by the women. It takes great courage, time and organisation to put on a theatre performance, and I remind hon. Members that those women were doing that without any of the props, opportunities or finance that any theatre group in Britain would expect.

Rose Banda has now organised those women's clubs into two overarching organisations: "Shading the Shame", which is an HIV/AIDS project, and the Milanzi HIV/AIDS care and support foundation. It is her intention—I hope that we can help her—to ensure that NGO funding can be directed through those umbrella organisations at the clubs, which are self-helping, committed to the community and primarily run by women.

We need to work with MPs in other countries on the mechanisms for accessing aid, which has proved extremely difficult. Few NGOs operate in that part of Zambia, and I have not had much success in persuading more to get involved with the people of Milanzi. However, I will keep trying, and the result of the programme is that I now see myself, to a degree, as one of the champions for the people of Zambia. As I have mentioned, the high commission has already adopted projects through DFID in eastern province, but much more is needed. I shall keep pressing for more help to be given to Zambia.

[Joan Ruddock]

I want to draw hon. Members' attention to the country's position with its debt payments. I hope that my hon. Friend who will reply to the debate may be able to pass this on to appropriate Ministers. I understand from a recently released report about education in Zambia that was co-authored by Oxfam and VSO that the Zambian Government will pay $377 million dollars in debt repayments compared with $221 million on education, and that there are between 8,000 and 9,000 unemployed teachers in that country. They are qualified teachers who are able to work but whom the Government are unable to pay—education is entirely a Government service—because of the limits that the International Monetary Fund has placed on Government expenditure. There is surely a need to separate the fundamental needs for basic education and basic health care from all the other aspects of governance and IMF funding. Zambia and many other African countries need that.

I am also working on a twinning arrangement for Kagora basic school. The people there asked me whether I could find a school in my constituency, and I am delighted to say that that has now happened; I hope that Haberdashers' Aske's will be involved in the twinning process. We can imagine how difficult that will be. The children in Zambia will not be able to communicate in the usual way. Somebody from the school will have to travel along those terrible roads and deal with all the other difficulties to get to the nearest place where they can pick up an e-mail or a letter. That will be difficult. It would be so much easier if they had their solar-powered computer and their satellite phone connection, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey proposed.

We must do such things. It will never be possible to deliver piped water and electricity to those tiny communities in the old-fashioned way. We need new ideas and new mechanisms. That is what we can contribute; we can share our knowledge and expertise with them. I would hate it if the people of Milanzi were forced to move lock, stock and barrel into the cities, where they would encounter a new and, in some senses, an even more difficult lifestyle and greater deprivation.

I pay tribute again to the British Council. I echo everything that previous speakers have said. I was recently in Russia, where I saw the magnificent work that it is doing there and its hugely imaginative programmes. I have no doubt that this twinning arrangement has been of great value. I hope that it will continue, and I am very grateful for having had the opportunity to participate in it.

3.2 pm

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on securing this debate. Like her, I have shared in the twinning arrangement that the British Council in east Africa has so imaginatively developed. My twin, the hon. Ruth Msafiri, is a Tanzanian MP. She came here in November 2002, and I returned the visit in February the following year. I have had an opportunity to share that experience with Members. Therefore, while keeping much of that in mind and using it, I want to talk briefly about a return visit that I was able to make to Tanzania this year as a member of the Parliamentary Commonwealth Association. I met Ruth again and found out more about developments, particularly in education, which I want to share with hon. Members shortly.

First, however, I shall highlight the British Council's continuing work in Tanzania, and pay tribute to it. One of its key projects remains the politics of the future. That includes training for women MPs, but it goes much further. The politics of the future or POF programme includes computer training; training in key parliamentary procedures; planning and budgeting of central Government; understanding electoral law, which has changed recently in Tanzania; campaign management; fundraising; lobbying skills; and working with the media. That is the kind of background training that any current parliamentary candidate or new Member would value. However, as we can imagine, that is particularly the case in a situation where women especially are newly coming into office.

Work is also being done by the centre for international development at the state university of New York. We met Donna Bugby-Smith, who works out of the British Council office on a project to empower people and institutions to develop their own capabilities—a definition that I read out carefully, because it is important to stress the phrase "their own capabilities". We are working not only with MPs, but with civil society—non-governmental organisations and those working for HIV/AIDS organisations and on local community development projects—and enabling them to understand their role in local, regional and national society and within the Government.

Our visit was very positive and very purposeful, yet more than 1,000 teachers a year are dying from HIV/AIDS in Tanzania. It is a struggle simply to maintain the existing number of teachers in that country, let alone to meet the need to develop education further, and especially primary education, in line with the millennium projects and the call of the Commission for Africa.

I return to my visit to a teacher training college, Katoke, in Ruth Msafiri's constituency of Muleba, North on the shores of Lake Victoria. The college has no computers, a library that has not been restocked since the 1970s and a crying need for solar computers. I heartily commend my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) on his vision of an open school. That is exactly what is needed. The idea of carting outdated textbooks to schools such as those in Ruth Msafiri's constituency should not be entertained any longer.

We must get solar computers into remote villages, but most of all we need to get help to the teacher's training college, which provides mainly textbook resource and training to 500 primary school teachers. Enriching the value of that training and education would have a huge impact on the whole of Ruth Msafiri's constituency. I have a large constituency of some 84,000 constituents. Ruth Msafiri has at least 100,000, but she does not really know how many there are. There are some 50 primary schools of varying quality in her area, but at the time of my visit there were only two secondary schools for the whole constituency.

There is an urgent need at higher education level to train sufficient numbers of people at a sufficient level to train the teachers. Fortuitously, Bristol university's education department is twinned with the education department at Dar es Salaam university, but it does not seem to be a long-term twinning with the underpinning of finance and support that is needed to develop the relationship throughout the country or to ensure that its impact is felt in Tanzania. Indeed, it is crucial to recognise how essential African students of all countries are to higher education internationally.

I particularly wanted to speak today about the British Council report, "Vision 2020: Forecasting International Student Mobility—A UK Perspective", which was published this spring. It examines the need for this country to keep its share of the market in overseas students coming to this country or through e-learning in order that our higher education economy might be boosted.

The Prime Minister challenged the British Council to bring some 75,000 extra overseas students to this country, and it has delivered. The contribution from students from all over the world enriches our universities, and also sends students back all over the world with an understanding of Britain and an ability to share that experience in their own countries. Those students usually become friends of Britain for life.

The whole report emphasised the need for paying students, or students who can afford to pay. As a Government, we need to consider more carefully how we encourage students from Africa who are unable to pay the fees to come to this country. I looked at the work of the British Council in Tanzania in that respect; in 2003, the country had nine Chevening and Commonwealth scholars, and in 2004 it had 10, thanks to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There is some higher education link work to the value of more than £90,000, but it comes from the Department for International Development. It is not mainstream education funding in line with the Commission for Africa and the millennium goal for education. The Government received the British Council report very warmly, but I ask them to reconsider it in the context of how many students can come here from African countries to which they would take back their learning and experience. That would enhance the quality of education in many developing African countries, and that is my plea.

I shall end with an anecdote, to which I made a small contribution, and an important fact. This summer, I was introduced to the Prime Minister of Tanzania as Valerie Davey, and he said, "Mrs. Davey?" I said "Yes", and he said, "You taught me at Ilboru school." That was in the 1960s, I have to admit, but it was a stunning moment in my visit. We should remember that the former President of Tanzania, President Nyerere, a statesman of Africa and of the world, is a former student of Edinburgh university. Such links are extremely valuable and we should look again at the status of students from Africa who are unable to pay the fees.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (in the Chair): I remind hon. Members who are winding up the debate that it has to conclude at 3.44 pm.

3.12 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on securing the debate. At the beginning of the debate, she was breathless; I was not sure whether she had run up the stairs to get here on time or whether she was breathless at the prospect of Neil Kinnock joining the British Council. However, she made it clear later that she was excited about her shadowing experience—a feeling that was echoed by other hon. Members.

I am happy to join other hon. Members in giving plaudits to the work of the British Council. It helpfully supplied statistics, which are outstanding: it works in 220 towns and cities in 110 countries—I suspect that few organisations can make a similar claim—teaching English to more than half a million people. It collaborates in almost 2,000 arts events globally and has an earning potential of almost £200 million from clients and customers worldwide. Those are impressive statistics.

The British Council has been well established in a number of countries for a very long time. It has been in Botswana since 1972, in Cameroon since 1970, in Eritrea since 1971 and in Ethiopia since 1942, although it closed there in 1951 and reopened in 1960. Its long-term commitment to Africa is very welcome, and I am pleased that there has been a funding commitment from the Chancellor, who announced on 12 July that the budget would increase from £173 million to £197 million in 2007–08. The British Council receives a reasonable stream of contracts from DFID, among others.

One minor point to which I hope the hon. Gentleman will respond in winding up is that although the stream of contracts that the British Council receives is welcome, it fluctuates significantly from one year to the next. I received a parliamentary answer yesterday saying that the figure had gone from £24 million in 1999–2000 to £17 million in 2000–01, down further to £10 million in 2001–02, back up to just less than £20 million in 2002–03 and finally down to £13 million in 2003–04. The British Council might find it hard to accommodate those fluctuations.

The focus that the British Council puts on to Africa is important and pertinent. In the long-term, given that DFID's budget has changed to support the poorest countries more, I wonder whether the British Council should, similarly, focus its efforts on the poorest countries. I was interested to hear the detail of the work shadowing experience of a number of Members, particularly the point about Members of Parliaments in certain African countries being expected to provide money to their constituents. I was fortunate enough to visit Ghana a month or so ago, on a trip sponsored by Oxfam.
